2. Consider God's sovereignty over you. He is the great Potter, and you are his clay; and, why may he not do with you as he pleaseth? If your children offend you, you scourge them, and perhaps do it sometimes without reason; yet how ill do you take it, when they refuse to submit! How will you drive and spur your horses under you, and perhaps sometimes unreasonably! Yet they bear all quietly, and make no resistance. Shall they take blows from their master; and will you not from your Maker, that has far more power over you? If any challenge you for cruelty to your children or beasts, you take it not well, because you think you may do what you will with your own, and no man hath right to quarrel you: but hath not God a greater property in you, than you in your children or cattle? And will you not patiently submit to your wise and absolute sovereign?

3. Consider thy sin as the meritorious cause of all thy afflictions, however heavy they be. If thou hast right thoughts of thy sins, and the aggravations thereof, thy mind may be composed to a patient submission to God's hand: if sin be heavy on thee, all thy afflictions will be light. Luther gives us this as a reason why he slighted the rage of the pope and the emperor, and all his outward troubles: "They are all little to me, because sin is so weighty on me." Hence it was, that Paul complained not at all of his sufferings, great as they were; but he cried out much of his sins, Rom. vii. 23, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" Sense of sin swallows up the sense of affliction, as the ocean doth little brooks. For with whom shouldst thou quarrel, but thyself, when thou bringest troubles on thyself? This consideration should bring thee to resolve, and say with the prophet, Mic. vii. 9, "I will bear the indignation of the Lord, because I have sinned against him."

4. Consider how sharp soever the pains are you are called to bear, yet they fall infinitely short of what you have justly deserved at God's hands. It is of his infinite mercy, that death and everlasting destruction hath not been your portion long since; and that you are not now groaning under the extremity of his indignation in the bottomless pit, together with the devil and his angels. And, consequently, whatever falls short of this, is truly a great mercy, and is so far from being ground of quarrelling, that the greatest sufferer on this side hell, hath just cause to admire God's clemency in dealing more favourably with him than he hath deserved.

5. Compare thy case with others that have been, or presently are in distress. Do not say, there is none so hardly dealt with as thou art; for thou knowest not the affliction of others. Consider duly the trials of that eminent saint, Job, in all the circumstances thereof, and see if you can say, that your sorrow is near so great as his sorrow was. Again, compare your case with that of the damned in hell, who lie and burn in endless and ceaseless flames, so that they have no rest, day nor night, but the smoke of their torment ascends for ever! And think what a blessing it is, that you are yet in a state of salvation, and not delivered over to those everlasting burnings which were the due demerits of your sins, and to which you might long ago have been justly condemned, had it not been for the patience and long-suffering of Almighty God, who waiteth to be gracious to guilty sinners. When you consider these things, instead of being dissatisfied with the divine dispensations, you have cause to bless God that matters are not worse with you; and that you are kept out of hell to this day, where thousands, not more guilty than you, are presently roaring in endless desperation.

Unto these considerations, I shall subjoin some few helps, or advices, in order to the attaining of patience under sore troubles. 1st. Labour to get pardon of sin, and peace with God, secure to thy soul, and this will enable you to bear the heaviest cross with patience. Hence it was that Luther cried, "Smite, Lord, as thou wilt, I take all in good part, seeing my sins are pardoned: O, pardon of sin is the crowning blessing, therefore I will bear any thing, I will swallow up quarrelling into admiring; I will welcome the pruning knife, seeing there is no fear of the bloody axe to fell me down."

2d. Labour to see God's hand in thy affliction. Do not, like the dog, snarl at the stone, but look up to the hand that throws it. And surely a view of the hand of a holy God may serve to calm all the boisterous waves of thy corruption; so did it with David, Psal. xxxix. 9, "I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, because thou didst it." When he looked to the instruments and second causes of his afflictions, his heart waxed hot, and the fire of his inward passion began to burn and break out; but, when he once espied God's hand and seal to the warrant for his correction, he became silent, and patiently submitted to the divine will.

3d. Get a humble and self-denied frame of spirit, that you may have low thoughts of yourself, and of all your attainments whatsoever. A proud man cannot think of submitting to the divine will, but will break before he bow. Hence we see a vast difference between a proud Pharaoh, and an humble Eli, under the rod; the one says, "Who is the Lord, that I should obey him?" But the other saith, "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good."

4th. Get love to Jesus Christ. Love is an enduring principle, 1 Cor. xiii. 7. It endureth all things. It makes the soul, like the kindly child, draw nearer to Christ the more it is beaten.

5th. Interpret God's ways and dealings with you always in the best sense. And, lastly, be earnest in prayer, that God may conquer your rebellious will, and subdue those mutinous risings of heart within you against himself.

DIRECT. VI.—BEWARE OF ENVYING WICKED MEN, WHEN YOU SEE THEM IN HEALTH AND PROSPERITY.

THE psalmist, when he was chastened every morning, and in great adversity, was liable to this evil, Psal. lxxiii. 3, "I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked." Corrupt nature doth strongly incline us to this sinful disposition, especially in the day of sore affliction: "For the spirit that dwelleth in us lusteth to envy," James iv. 5. But, did we rightly consider the state of wicked men, we would see greater ground to pity than envy them, in the most prosperous condition: Why? "The prosperity of fools shall destroy them," Prov. i. 32. It makes them forget God, and turn hardened and secure in sin, which hastens their ruin. Who would envy a malefactor's going up a high ladder, and being mounted above the rest of the people, when it is only for a little, and in order to his being turned over and hanged? This is just the case of the wicked men, who are mounted up high in prosperity; for it is so only that they may be cast down deeper into destruction. Observe that word, Psal. xxxvii. 1, 2, "Fret not thyself because of evil doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity: for they shall soon be cut down like grass," &c., and that word, Psal. xcii. 7, "When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity flourish, it is that they shall be destroyed for ever." It would be a brutish thing to envy an ox of his high and sweet pasture, when he is only thereby fitted for the day of slaughter. Who would have envied the beasts of old, the garlands and ribbons with which the heathens adorned them, when they went to be sacrificed? These external ornaments of health, wealth, pleasures, and preferences, wherewith wicked men are endowed, cannot make their state happy, nor change their natures to the better. Whatever appearance those things make in the eyes of the world, they are but like a nauseous dunghill covered with scarlet, as vile and loathsome in God's sight as ever. How quickly is the beauty of earthly things blasted! "The triumphing of the wicked is short," Job xx. 5. They live in pleasures on the earth for a while; but God sets them in slippery places, from whence they soon slide into perpetual pain and anguish. They have a short time of mirth, but they shall have an eternity of mourning. The longer their prosperity is, their sins are the greater, and their sufferings will be more grievous. But, O believer, it is in mercy to thee that God hedges up thy way with thorns, that thou mayest not find thy path; whilst he turns the wicked loose, and suffers them to stray and wander whither they will, to their eternal ruin. God takes this method with thee to make thee meet for an inheritance, and prepare you for a crown of glory; but he takes a contrary way with the wicked, to fit them for destruction: therefore you ought not to be fretful under his hand, but thankful. We read of queen Elizabeth, when she was in prison, how she envied the poor milk-maid she saw passing by, and would have thought herself happy to have been in her condition: but had that afflicted princess known the glorious reign of forty-four years she was soon to enter upon, she would not have repined at the happiness of so mean a person. But, O afflicted believer, it is not a glorious reign for a set number of years, that is provided for thee; it is even a reign with glorious Christ thy Redeemer, for ever and ever: and, hast thou any ground to be discontented or envious?

DIRECT. VII.—GUARD AGAINST REFINING COMPLAINTS AND DISCONTENTED MURMURINGS, AGAINST THE PROVIDENCE OF GOD, UNDER HEAVY SICKNESS AND AFFLICTION.

WE see the mourners and complainers are classed with those that walk after their own lusts, Jude 16. I know the people of God are liable to murmuring and impatience also under affliction; but there is a great difference between them and the wicked. I will have occasion to speak of believers murmuring afterwards, when I come to speak of their case in particular; but here I shall handle the sin of murmuring in general, and as it appears mainly in the unregenerate under heavy affliction.

This sin of murmuring is the froth of impatience, and scum of discontent; it is first cherished by repining thoughts, and then vented by unsuitable complaints and expostulations, taxing the administration of Providence, as if God dealt too hard with us. Our very thoughts are audible with God, yea, as loud in his ears, as words are in ours; but it is yet worse, when repining thoughts are not crushed, but suffered to break forth into words tending to the dishonour of God.

Quest. But is it altogether unlawful to complain of affliction, whatever be our ease?

Ans. Humble complaints are not murmurings, nor sinful in themselves, otherwise there would be no room for prayer, and for spreading out our distressed case before the Lord. We find God's children making complaints in affliction; but when they do not complain of God, but to God, with an humble inquiry into the cause and meaning of his dispensations, and laying all the blame upon themselves, as did Job, chap. x. 1, 2, "I will leave my complaint upon thyself. I will speak in the bitterness of my soul, I will say unto God, Do not condemn me; show me wherefore thou contendest with me." Thus the blessed Son of God himself did in his distress, when he cried, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" But there, we observe, he complains to God, not of God; he hath not a hard word or thought of God, but expresseth a holy confidence in God, "My God, my God;" he hath two words of faith for one word of fear. He humbly inquires into the cause of the dispensation, and desires to bring up his will to God, not that God should bring down his will to him. If it be possible (says he) let this cup pass; however, glorify thy name, provide for thy own glory, and do with me what thou pleasest. In this matter our Lord sets himself as an example of patience to us, teaching us to beware of impatient murmuring and quarrelling with God's providence in our affliction; which many times we are guilty of, either when we harbour harsh thoughts of God's dealings, or break forth into rash and unadvised speeches; when we charge God foolishly, and complain either of too much severity, as Ezek. xviii. 2, 25; or of too long delay, as Isa. xlix. 14; or when our complaints are mixed with unbelief and distrust, as Psal. lxxviii. 19; or when we complain more of our punishment than we do of our sin, and nothing will satisfy us but deliverance from trouble.

Now, to deter you from those murmurings and complaints in trouble, I shall lay before you the following considerations: 1. They who deserve worst, commonly complain and murmur most, and are most ready to think they are hardly dealt with. The unthankful Israelites were still murmuring; ambitious Absalom was discontented; bloody Haman, in the midst of all his greatness, cries out, "What doth all this avail me?" But humble Jacob saith, he was not worthy of the least of all the mercies and truth which God had showed him. And holy Job blesses God, and patiently submits, when he took from him, as well as when he gave to him.

2. Murmuring is a sin that God takes special notice of, and looks on it as an injury and affront done immediately against himself, Num. xiv. 27, "I have heard the murmurings of the children of Israel, which they murmur against me." He that gives ear to the groans of his own spirit, doth also hear the grumbings of thine, and will reckon with thee for them.

3. It can nowise benefit or relieve us in distress. I may say of sinful complaining (as Christ of sinful care), which of you, by complaining, can add one cubit to his stature? What ease or relief can you get by contending with God? Nay, instead of easing you of your burden, it will make it heavier; as a child, the more he struggles with his parents, he is the more beaten. The Israelites were once within eleven days' journey of Canaan; but, by their murmurings, they provoked God to lead them forty years' march in the wilderness, before they could reach it.

4. Whatever be your distress, there is no just ground for complaints whilst thou hast thy life for a prey. Remember that word of the afflicted church, Lam. iii. 39, "Wherefore doth a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins?" A man living, a man upon the earth, a man out of hell, hath no cause to complain, whatever be his afflictions. For, let him compare his sin and punishment together, and he will find there is no proportion: sin is a transgression against the infinite God; punishment is but an affliction upon the finite creature: sin strikes at the very being of God; but punishment only at the comfort of the creature. So that whatever your punishment be, you have more cause to give thanks than to complain, and to say, with Ezra, "Thou hast punished us less than our iniquities deserve. It might have been a thousand times worse, if strict justice had been the rule; it is of the Lord's mercies we are not consumed."

5. When you murmur under sickness, you quarrel with the messenger of that sovereign God who gave you your lives, and can take them again when he thinks fit; and we know, messengers ought not to be maltreated or abused, whatever be their commission, and far less when they are sent upon a good design. Now, if you consider the design of this messenger, and his errand to you, instead of fretting and quarrelling at his coming, you ought rather to bless God that sends such a suitable harbinger and forerunner, to tell you that death is approaching, and that he vouchsafes to take so much pains on you, to wean you from the world, and make you willing to be gone, by long continued trouble; when he might have seized you in a violent manner, and driven you away by main force, without using any means to obtain your consent. Have not many, who were most unwilling to die, at the beginning of a sickness, been brought, by the increase and continuance of it, to be well satisfied to leave the world, and long to be with Christ? And were not this for their advantage?

6. Consider the great evil and sinfulness of impatient murmurings, complaints, and quarrellings, under affliction.

1st. Murmuring hath in it much unbelief and distrust of God, Psal. cvi. 24, 25, "They believed not his word, but murmured in their tents." They could not believe that the wilderness was the way to Canaan, that God would provide and furnish a table for them there, and relieve them in all their straits. So it is with us in trouble; we quarrel with God's providence, because we do not believe his promises; we do not believe that this can be consistent with love, or can work for good in the end.

2d. It hath in it unthankfulness. While we complain of one affliction, we overlook a thousand mercies. The Israelites murmured so for what they had not, that they unthankfully forgot all that they had. Whereas, a thankful person is so far from fretting that God doth not give him every thing, that he wonders that God should give him any thing. "I am less than the least of all thy mercies," said Jacob. We are perplexed, said Paul, but not in despair; we have God to go to, which is matter of praise; but the murmurer unthankfully overlooks all his present, and forgets all his former mercies; and gives not God thanks for any thing. Because God removes his comforts, his health, strength, and ease, for a time; all the years he formerly enjoyed, though most undeservedly, are quite buried in oblivion.

3d. It implies much pride and self-conceit. He that complains of God's dealings, secretly applauds his own deservings. Only by pride comes contention. When men have a conceit of themselves, they pick quarrels with God's providence, being apt to think they deserve better treatment at his hands; whereas the humble soul is sensible he deserves nothing but wrath, and therefore lays his hand on his mouth when the Lord afflicts him.

4th. It involves men into rebellion against God. When God strikes men for sin, murmurers fly in his face, and kick against his strokes, like bullocks unaccustomed to the yoke. They, in some respect, resemble that desperate apostate Julian, of whom it is written, that he shot up his darts against heaven, when he was in distress.

They fulfil that word, Prov. xix. 3, "The foolishness of man perverteth his way, and his heart fretteth against the Lord." The repining heart boils with rage against God and his dispensations, like those wicked Jews when hungry and hardly bestead, Isa. viii. 21, "They shall fret themselves, and curse their king and their God, and look upwards."

5th. It imports much impenitency and unhumbleness for sin; and that we have seen little of the intrinsic evil of sin; and of our ill-deservings for it. Can we truly believe that our sins deserve hell-fire, and yet impatiently repine at sickness and lesser strokes upon our bodies?

6th. It includes much atheism and blasphemy against God, and his infinite perfections, in several respects: (1.) By our impatient murmurings, we either virtually deny that things here below are governed by God's providence; or else,

(2.) We tax his providence with unrighteousness in the management thereof; as if God did withhold from us what is due, or inflict on us what we have not deserved. O what atheism is this! Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? May he not, upon the justest ground, answer every murmur, as Matt. xx. 13, "Friend, I do thee no wrong?"

(3.) We in effect grasp at the sovereignty, and usurp the throne of the Most High God, and would have the disposal of things in our hands; yea, we presume to summon God to our bar to give account of his administration, when we take upon us to quarrel any of his dispensations. Alas, we little remember the woe that is pronounced against so doing, Is. xlv. 9, "Woe unto him that striveth with his Maker: shall the clay say to him that fashioneth it, What makest thou? or thy work, He hath no hands?"

(4.) We on the matter take sin's part against God; we either justify it, or extenuate its evil, and allege, by our murmurings, that God is unrighteous to punish such small sins with such heavy afflictions.

(5.) We virtually question God's power to give us a great blow, when we enter the lists with God, and contend with our Maker. Is it not in effect to say, We know how to reduce him to our terms, or make our party good against him?

(6.) We disparage his wisdom, and take upon us to be his counsellors, as if we could instruct him better in the management of affairs, and teach him what is fit to be done with his creatures. Hear what the Lord saith, Job xi. 2, "Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty, instruct him? He that reproveth God, let him answer it." Murmuring is a reproving of God, and a charging him with ill conduct, saying, in effect, with Absalom, "There is none that takes care to order men's affairs; O, that I were king of the world! then should things be better ordered than now they are." So blasphemous is the language of our impatient murmurings. Let us, therefore, be ashamed of them, and abhor ourselves in dust and ashes, for our foolishness in censuring the actions of the only wise God. Shall a poor ignorant passenger, that understands not the use of the compass, be angry that the skilful pilot will not steer the vessel according to his pleasure?

(7.) We hereby slight and undervalue the riches of Divine goodness, of which we have formerly shared, and do still partake; like the foolish and peevish children, if they cannot have their will, and get something they want, do presently throw away the things which they have, saying, with unthankful Haman, "All this availeth me nothing."

Lastly, I might add, This sin hath some resemblance to hell itself; for there the damned continually vex and torment themselves with their fretting and impatient thoughts, which cause them to break out into fearful rage and blasphemy against God.

Quest. "But how shall we prevent such discontented murmurings? for sometimes trouble is so great, we cannot bear it patiently."

Ans. God hath given you reason to bear rule over passion, and furnish you with strong arguments to prevail against discontents. Why then should you be so brutish as to dethrone reason, and suffer sense and passion to govern you? Are you not Christians, and sworn to live according to the rules of that excellent religion? Why then do you act so contrary to your profession and engagements?

Besides what I have already said, I shall add some few Remedies more, for the cure of this murmuring distemper.

1. Look on thy murmurings, as worse than all thy pains and troubles whatsoever; those are but afflictions from God, but these are sins grievous and provoking unto God.

2. Remember the judgments which murmuring hath brought down from heaven upon sinners. Miriam was smitten with a leprosy for it; Dathan and Abiram were swallowed up alive; fiery serpents, plagues, and exclusion from Canaan, were Israel's judgment for this sin, 1 Cor. x. 10, "Neither murmur ye, as some of them murmured, and were destroyed of the destroyer." The arrows which murmurers shoot against heaven, soon return upon their own heads.

3. Whatever thy sufferings are for the present, yet still believe thy case might be worse. The troubles that light upon the body, are nothing so terrible as those that light upon the soul, Prov. xviii. 14, "A wounded spirit who can bear?" They are nothing to what thy innocent Saviour suffered upon the cross; yea, nothing to what some martyrs have endured for the truths of the gospel.

4. Get very low thoughts of yourself, and a deep sense of ill deservings for sin. O! should a fire-brand of hell murmur for temporal afflictions?

5. Be still examining thyself, rather than censuring God. Doth God seem to neglect thee, say, Alas, it is most just! Have I not neglected him, and given a deaf ear to his calls many a day?

6. Bear in mind that those troubles will not last; there is a great change near; either they will issue in life or death. If life, you will be ashamed you had no more patience when sick; if death, then if you belong to Christ, it will give a finishing stroke to all troubles and complaints, and heaven will make amends for all. But if you be not in Christ, whatever your afflictions be now, troubles a thousand times worse are abiding you in another world: death will turn thy crosses into pure unmixed curses; and then, how gladly wouldst thou return to thy former afflicted state, and purchase it at any rate, were there any possibility of such a return! You now fly out in a passion, and say you are not able to bear what you complain of; but consider, if you will not obediently bear God's rod now, you will then bear more, whether you will or not; and God will make you able to bear more, when there will never be any hopes of relief.

7. Study to give vent to thy sorrow in a way of prayer and praise. An oven stopped is the more hot within; but the breath of prayer, or praise, gives ease. If we did complain more to God, we should complain less of God. What a mercy is it, that you have still God to go to. Improve the privilege, confess unworthiness, and beg the grace of patience and submission out of Christ's full treasures. Be also praising God for mercies received; and, however bad thy case is, bless God it is not in hell; you are in the land of hope.

CHAPTER III.

CONTAINING SPECIAL DIRECTIONS TO THE CHILDREN OF GOD, WHEN UNDER SICKNESS, OR ANY OTHER AFFLICTION.

DIRECT. I.—LET BELIEVERS ESPECIALLY GUARD AGAINST FAINTINGS, OR DESPONDING UNDER GOD'S AFFLICTING HAND.

THIS is an exhortation which God in a peculiar manner directs unto his children, Heb. xii. 5, "My son, despise thou not the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him." There are two extremes mentioned, despising and fainting; I spoke of the first before, in Chap. II. Direct. II. It is a duty to feel our affliction, but a sin to faint under it. God's people may be said to faint under their trials, when they sink or despond, or give way to fretting or repining under them. In the preceding direction I spoke of the evil of murmuring in general; here I shall speak of believers fainting in particular.

I. I shall enquire whence their fainting under affliction doth proceed.

II. Bring some arguments and helps against this evil.

III. Answer some objections of fainting believers.

I. As to the first, whence those faintings in believers do proceed: 1. They proceed from the grievousness of their affliction, and the heaviness of their burden, which is ready to amaze and stagger their thoughts, and sink their spirits with fear and despondency. Hence did the psalmist complain, Ps. lx. 3, "Thou hast showed thy people hard things; thou hast made us to drink the wine of astonishment." And, Ps. lxxix. 2, "I sink in deep mire, where there is no standing: I am come into deep waters, where the floods overflow me."

2. From the smallness of their spiritual strength, and particularly the weakness of their faith, Prov. xxiv. 10, "If thou faint in the day of adversity, thy strength is small." Whence was it that Peter fainted and began to sink in the waters, but from the weakness of his faith? Mat. xiv. 30, 31. We know not our strength till it be tried. Sometimes we have such a conceit of it, that we think, like Paul, we can walk upon a sea of trouble: but, in a little, behold some surprising blast assaults our confidence; and then we faint, and cry out with him, "Help, Lord, or else we perish." Peter reckoned only upon the sea, but did not think of the boisterous wind; and he looked to his dangers, more than to the power that was to carry him through them.

3. From their impatience of delay. When deliverance is long a-coming, it is not easy to wait God's leisure, and to keep the heart from desperate conclusions, Psal. xxxi. 22, "I said in my haste, I am cut off from before thine eyes."

4. From the power of Satan's temptations, and furious assaults. When Satan is let loose in time of affliction to throw in his fiery darts, the believer is ready to faint, and say, as Psal. lxxvii. 8, "Is his mercy clean gone for ever," &c.

5. From their wearisome conflicts with a body of death, and an ill heart. These, in time of affliction, add affliction to the afflicted.

6. From long and great deserts. When God hides his face from the believer in affliction, his soul faints under it, as in Isa. xlv. 14, "Zion hath said, The Lord hath forsaken me, my God hath forgotten me."

7. From the consciousness of their guilt, and ill deservings before God, upon the account of old sins, abuse of mercies, and untender walking before God. Affliction revives old sins, as with Job, Job xiii. 26, "Thou writest bitter things against me, and makest me to possess the sins of my youth." His old sins, and guilt of his youthful follies, now revived upon him, and sat close to his conscience; which occasioned his fainting under his burden.

8. Great afflictions frequently cloud the believer's graces and evidences for heaven, and discover their corruptions; whereby they are made to sink under their trial. They see more unbelief, impatience, distrust, and enmity to God in them, than they saw before; they see more of the weakness of grace, and of their want of faith and love, than before; whereby they are sometimes tempted to raze the foundation, and say all their former attainments were but delusions, and their professions but hypocrisy. These things make afflictions sometimes very heavy and sinking to the people of God.

II. In the next place, for preventing and helping this evil of fainting under affliction; let believers consider,

1. These heavy trials are all needful for you. Deep waters are not more needful to carry a ship into the haven, than great afflictions are to carry the vessels of our souls into the port of bliss. Strong winds and thunder are frightful, but they are necessary to purge the air. One of the sharpest calamities that ever befel Israel, was the Babylonish captivity, yet even this was in mercy to them, for the Lord saith, Jer. xxiv. 5, "I have sent them out of this place into the land of the Chaldeans for their good." Strange! of freemen to be made prisoners, and that in a strange land among the heathen; to be removed far from their own houses, vineyards, friends; nay, and from the temple of God and his ordinances; and yet all this for their good! Why? They were hereby effectually weaned and broke off from their darling sin of idolatry.

2. Consider that your affliction, however heavy it be, will soon have an end, Isa. lvii. 16, "For I will not contend for ever, neither will I be always wroth; for the spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made." The goldsmith will not let his gold lie longer in the furnace than it is purified. The wicked have a sea of wrath to drink; but, O drooping believer, take comfort; you have but a cup of affliction, which will soon be exhausted. The time is near, when all thy trials shall have an end: in heaven there is no cross, no complaint, no tears, nor sorrows for ever.

3. Faint not, O child of God; for those afflictions are the hell which thou shalt have; thou hast nothing to fear hereafter. Judas had two hells, one in time, by terror in his conscience, another after this life, which endures to eternity; but all the hell that a believer hath is the light affliction, which is but for a moment.

4. Desponding or murmuring in affliction, is evil in any, but in none is it so bad as in the children of God. It very ill becomes their covenants, their privileges, their hopes. Have they resigned and given up themselves, and all they have, to God, by a solemn covenant, and will they fret when he disposeth of them! Didst thou not say, O believer, in the day when thy heart was stung with sin, and the terrors of God made thee afraid, "O, let me have Jesus Christ for my Saviour and portion, and I will be content though I should be stricken with boils like Job, or beg my bread with Lazarus?" Now, God tries thee if thou wilt stand to thy word: O beware of retracting. Hath not that soul enough, who hath an all-sufficient God for his portion? If God be thine in covenant, that comprehends all things.

5. It discomposes and unfits the soul for any duty. It is ill sailing in a storm, so it is ill praying when the heart is in a storm of disquiet and despondency.

6. Your fainting under affliction, and carrying as if the consolations of God were small, is enough to stumble others at religion, and make them call the truth of it in question. When they see those that profess religion, and have often declared that their rejoicing is in Christ Jesus as their portion, begin to sink and despond under outward afflictions, O, may not they be tempted to say, "Where is the truth of religion? Where are those divine supports and consolations we have often heard of?"

7. O then seek to get faith revived, and strengthened, and resolve with Job to trust in God, though he should slay you. This would be of noble use to keep the heart from sinking under pressures of affliction, as the psalmist found it to his sweet experience, Psal. xxvii. 13, "I had fainted, unless I had believed to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living."

III. I come to answer some objections or excuses of fainting believers, which they commonly allege as the ground of their discouragement in their afflictions.

Object. I. "O, saith one, my afflictions are not ordinary, they are sore pressures I lie under, and of various kinds too."

Ans. 1. O believer, God hath taken the ordering of your lot in his own hand, and he knows what is fittest for you. Should a man be left to carve out his own portion, it would soon appear he would be his own greatest enemy. We would all be for the dainties of pleasure and prosperity, which would not be for our soul's health; as children think green fruit the best diet, because they please their taste; but their parents are wiser to keep them from them.

2. God may see you have many and strong lusts to be subdued, and that you need many and sore afflictions to bring them down. Your pride and obstinacy of heart may be strong, your distempers deeply rooted, and therefore the physic must be proportioned to them; as with the Israelites, Psal. cvii. 11, 12, "Because they rebelled against the words of God, and contemned the counsels of the most High; therefore, he brought down their hearts with labour." O believer, your God and Father, that hath the mixing of your cup and portion, is a wise and skilful physician, who knows your constitution and your need, 1 Pet. i. 6, "If need be, you are in heaviness through manifold temptations." And, as he knows your need, so he understands your strength, 1 Cor. x. 13, "Faithful is he, that will not suffer you to be tempted above what you are able."

3. God sends great and sore troubles, that you may have the more experience of God's wisdom and mercy, in your support and deliverance, Psal. lxxi. 20, "Thou which hast showed me great and sore troubles, shalt quicken and bring me up again from the depths of the earth."

Object. II. "But, saith one, my affliction is singular; there was never any in my condition."

Ans. 1. It is very ordinary for every man in great distress to reckon his case singular, because he feels best what is nearest himself, but is a stranger to what his neighbour feels.

2. This suggestion is one of Satan's devices, that he may tempt a child of God to question his Father's love; but he is a liar, and not to be credited in what he saith: for others of your brethren have been afflicted in the same kind and degree, if not worse, 1 Pet. v. 9, "Knowing that the same afflictions are accomplished in your brethren that are in the world."

3. Whatever your case be, you must own your sufferings are not so great as your sins. The trials of God's people in Babylon were singular: yet Ezra owns, Ezra iv. 13, "Thou hast punished us less than our iniquities deserve." If our provoked Judge shall, in his clemency, send us to Babylon instead of hell, we have no cause to complain.

4. But, O child of God, however thou complainest of the singularity of affliction now, all such complaints will be taken out of thy mouth ere long, and the time is near, when thou shalt be made to wonder at the wisdom of God, in guiding so many sons and daughters to glory, through such a variety of trials, exercises, afflictions, and temptations; and made to say as those in Mark vii. 37, "He hath done all things well."

Object. III. "But, saith one, my affliction is long continued, and I see no outgate: and, how can I but faint under it?"

Ans. 1. It is not so long as your sins deserve; for in justice it might be for ever; it might be the worm that never dieth, and the fire that is never quenched.

2. Your sufferings on earth are not so long as your reward in heaven, Rom. viii. 18, "For I reckon that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us."

3. No length or continuance of affliction here should hinder a believer's comfort. If we take a view of our Head and pattern Jesus Christ, how long did his afflictions continue? No end was put to them, till he cried with a loud voice, and gave up the ghost. Though he was the Son of God, yet, from the hour of his birth to the moment of his death, from his manger to his cross, his affliction still increased, and he ended his days in the midst of them. Now, Christ is the Head of the church, and your great representative, O believers, into a conformity with whom you are predestinated; be content, then, to be like your Head and pattern, to have no ease or rest from afflictions, till you lie down in the grave; it is "there the wicked cease from troubling, and there the weary are at rest," Job iii. 17.

4. Remember that your afflictions are a part of Christ's cross, which your loving Redeemer hath contrived for your good, and hath appointed you to take up and bear with him. Now, love to Christ should keep you from wearying to bear off a part of Christ's cross, especially when he himself bears the heaviest end of it; nay, bears you and your cross both. It is said of Jacob, Gen. xxix. 20, that he "served seven years for Rachel, and they seemed to him but a few days, for the love he had for her." And shall not we endure a few years' affliction for our Lord Jesus Christ, who lived a life of sorrows, and died a cursed death, for our sakes? Had we more love to Christ, his cross would not be so tedious to us.

5. Should it not be good news to thee, that there is a deliverance for thee at death from all thy troubles, and that this time is hastening, and very near; be not anxious for an outgate here in time, for that savours too much of unbelief and love to the world. Doth it not seem to say, that you would be better content to be turned back again to the stormy tumultuous seas of this world, than to be safely and speedily landed at your rest above? That you would be more happy in a few temporal mercies on earth, than to enter upon your eternal inheritance with Christ?

Object. IV. "No wonder, saith one, that I faint under my affliction, for I want those consolations and supports which God used to reserve for afflicted saints."

Ans. 1. If God be presently chastising you for your sins, you must be content to feel the bitterness of sin, before you taste the sweetness of God's consolations.

2. Can you say that your afflictions have duly humbled you, and fitted you for comfort? Have they yet brought you to a willingness to quit and renounce all your beloved sins, and even to part with all your earthly enjoyments and comforts at God's call, and to be content with God in Christ alone, for your happiness and portion? If this be not done, your afflictions have not had their due effect, to prepare you for comfort, and, till then, you cannot expect it. You are in the hands of a wise and skilful physician, who will not too hastily heal and bind up your sores, so as to let them spoil and fester at the bottom.

3. Though you have no sensible consolations from God in your present trials, yet, you must still labour to keep in the way of duty, and live by faith on his promises. Believe firmly, that God is good to them that love him, and that there is forgiveness with him to the penitent sinner. And if all the stars withdraw their light whilst thou art in God's way, then assure yourself the sun is near the rising.

Object. V. "But my affliction is such, that it disables me from duty, and makes me useless and unprofitable; and this makes me faint under my burden."

Ans. 1. God sends afflictions, never to unfit, but to quicken you for the performance of duty; to make you repent more thoroughly, pray more fervently, flee to Christ more earnestly, and mind heaven more intensely.

2. If it be your duty to others that your affliction incapacitates you for, then remember, if God in his providence disable you for that, it is no longer a duty incumbent on you; and you must not grudge if God take you off, and put others in your room. God is a free and sovereign agent, and will be tied to no means or instrument whatsoever, for carrying on his work.

DIRECT. II.—LET THE CHILDREN OF GOD BE EXEMPLARY IN PATIENCE AND SUBMISSION TO GOD UNDER THEIR AFFLICTIONS.

I TREATED of patience, and gave some motives and helps to it, to all afflicted persons in general, Chap. II. Direct. V. But here I shall bring some special arguments to Christian patience and submission, proper for believers. You that God hath done so much for beyond others, ought to shine in this grace of patience, and be examples to others for it, when God chastens you, though with very sore affliction.

1. Study patience under affliction; for it is the common path and beaten road to heaven, that all the saints have trod, who have gone thither before you. Behold the print of the foot-steps of all the cloud of witnesses in this road; and would you be singular, and choose a way of your own? When God solemnly renewed his covenant with Abraham, and he had prepared the sacrifice, whereby it was to be ratified and confirmed, God made a smoking furnace to pass between the pieces of the sacrifice, Gen. xv. 17, to let him know that there was a furnace of affliction attending the covenant of grace and peace, and all that enter thereinto. God has appointed that all the stones of the spiritual and heavenly building shall be hewed and polished by affliction here: and we are not to think that God's ordinary way will be changed for us. We must not think to walk on roses, when so many worthies have marched through briers and thorns to heaven.

2. Consider that the greatest afflictions you meet with, are consistent with the love of God; nay, spring from his love to you. Every sanctified rod is a gift and royal donation sent by the hand of God to you, Phil. i. 29, "To you it is given, in behalf of Christ, not only to believe on him, but also to suffer for his sake." Now surely, if we look on the cross as a gift and honour, an advantage and blessing, we would bear it patiently, Psal. xciv. 12, "Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest, O Lord." O believer, thy temporal cross comes from the same love that thy eternal crown comes from, according to Rev. iii. 19, 21. Men will not take pains to correct stubborn servants, but will turn them out of doors; but love constrains them to chastise their sons. God out of hatred lets many a sinner go unpunished in this world; for, why should he prune or dress the tree which he intends for the fire? The malefactor escapes scourging that is condemned to the gallows, Job xxi. 30, "The wicked is reserved to the day of destruction, they shall be brought forth to the day of wrath." But it is far otherwise with the children of God. That is a strange word which Job hath, Job vii. 17, 18, "What is man that thou shouldst magnify him? and that thou shouldst set thine heart upon him? and that thou shouldst visit him every morning, and try him every moment?" Now, if we compare this place with others in the context, we will see how he acknowledgeth that the most overwhelming distress proceeds from the love and care of God, yea, from his fixing his heart on him, to magnify him, and do him good: and that for this end he doth chasten him every morning, and try him every moment. And that with such afflictions as for the present are so far from being joyous, as that they give the soul no rest, but make the man weary of his life; as he expresseth what effects his afflictions had on himself. Yea, it may be observed, in the providence of God from the foundation of the world, that those who have had most afflictions, have had most grace, and the most eminent testimonies of acceptance with God. Jesus Christ the Son of God, had the most affliction of any; and yet the Father always loved him, and was well pleased with him.

3. Consider the bright examples of patience which God sets before you in his word. Besides that of his dear Son the Lord Jesus Christ, of which I spoke before, consider the patience of Job, when he was stript of all his earthly comforts, and laid under the greatest afflictions, yet he calmly falls down and worships God, Job i. 12, and said, "Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return: the Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord. In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly." Consider the patience of David, when he was driven from his throne, from his house, and from God's sanctuary, and all this by his own son; yet, how submissive is he to God? 2 Sam. xv. 26, "Behold, here I am, let him do to me as seemeth good to him." And when Shimei cursed him and threw stones at him, he patiently bore it, and would suffer no harm to be done him for it, saying, as 2 Sam. xvi. 11, "Let him alone; and let him curse, for the Lord hath bidden him." Consider the patience of holy Eli, when, though he heard such news as, like a sudden clap of thunder, made the ears of such as heard it to tingle, and their hearts to tremble, yet he calmly and quietly submitted to it, 1 Sam. iii. 18, "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good." He doth not fly in God's face in a passion, but falls down at his feet in a humble submission. Observe, also, the wonderful patience of Aaron, when God afflicted him very sore; he is silent and submissive under the Lord's hand, Lev. x. 3, "And Aaron held his peace." If we consider the greatness of the punishment, we will see the more cause to commend the greatness of his patience. 1. Aaron lost his children; not his estate or worldly substance, but his children; these are a part of a man's bowels; other earthly losses are not comparable to this: therefore it was that Satan, that cunning enemy, reserved the loss of Job's children to the last onset, as his great master-piece and sharpest attack. How sadly did Rachel lament and weep for her children! Mat. ii. 18. Yet Aaron held his peace. 2. Aaron lost his two sons at once; how pathetically did David bewail the loss of one son! 2 Sam. xviii. 33, "O my son Absalom, my son, my son," &c.; yet Aaron lost both his sons together, and saith not one word; he held his peace. 3. Aaron lost them by a sudden death, of which he had no warning; sickness usually prepares men for the stroke that is coming by death; but Aaron met with a surprising blow, yet he held his peace. 4. Aaron's sons were not taken away by an ordinary stroke of God's hand, but by an extraordinary supernatural rod; for it is said, "there went out a fire from the Lord, and devoured them, and they died before the Lord," Lev. x. 2. He lost them in such a manner as might speak forth God's anger; now, a religious father had rather lose all his children in the favour of God, than one child in his anger; yet, whatever were the bitter ingredients of his cup, Aaron was not impatient against God that mixed it for him, but held his peace, because God did it.

4. To engage you to patience under your trials, just compare your case with that of others. Do not say, there are none afflicted as you are; for there are many far deeper plunged in the waters of Marah than you are; some are still upon the rack, and spend their whole days and years in continual fighting and struggling; as in Psal. xxxi. 10, "My life is spent with grief, and my years with sighing." Have you sore distress in your bodies? others have grievous wounds in their souls. Do you hear the wrath of man? others hear the wrath of God. You have but one single trial, others have many twisted together. Some are stript of all comforts, you have comforts still remaining. You have many sad things in your trial, but you have not ground as yet to complain as the psalmist doth, Psal. xlii. 7, "All thy waves and thy billows are gone over me." Take a view of what the Son of God, what the apostles, and what the martyrs, and other worthies have endured. They had trial of cruel mockings, scourgings, bonds, and imprisonments; they wandered in deserts and mountains, and in dens and caves of the earth, being destitute, afflicted, tormented. They were tempted, they were crucified, stoned to death, sawn asunder, slain with the sword, &c. And yet, how well did they take with the cross? Saith Paul, "We glory in tribulation," Rom. v. 3. And what saith James, James i. 2, "My brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations." As if he had said, "Rejoice aye more and more that you are afflicted; God is magnifying you, he is visiting you, doing you good, taking the more pains on you, and fitting you for glory."

5. The consideration of God's former mercies and kindnesses to you should engage you to patience in trouble, and make you blush to take any thing ill out of God's hand. Thus Job taught his impatient wife, Job ii. 10, "What! shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" O believer, let not thy affliction cause thee to bury thy mercies in oblivion. Has not God brought thee from Satan's family, and put you among his children; and will you forget or undervalue that honour? Hath he struck off thy fetters, taken off thy prison garments, and set you at liberty; and will you be unthankful? Hath he given thee Christ for thy treasure and portion, and entitled you to his unsearchable riches; and will you be discontented? Hath he given you the graces of his Spirit, which are more precious than rubies, and will you quarrel when he smites in some outward things? Hath he made you an heir of glory, and provided eternal mansions above for you; and will you be fretful for want of some trifles here? The view Moses had of the recompence of reward in heaven, caused him to choose to suffer affliction with the people of God.

6. The time of affliction is usually God's gracious season of meeting with his people, the time of their rarest comforts and sweetest foretastes of heaven, according to 2 Cor. i. 5. Paul and Silas never sung more joyfully than when they were laid in the inner prison, with their backs torn with scourges, and their feet fast in the stocks, Acts xvi. 24. And when was it that Jacob saw the angels of God ascending and descending upon the ladder that reached between heaven and earth, but at the time when he was in a destitute case, forced to lie in the open field, having no canopy but the heavens, and no pillow but a stone? When was it that the three children saw Christ in the likeness of the Son of man walking with them, but when they were in the furnace, and that when it was hotter than ordinary? When was it that Ezekiel had a vision of God, but when sitting solitary by the river Chebar in the land of his captivity? When was it that John got a glorious vision of Christ, but when he was an exile in the isle of Patmos? And when was it that Stephen saw the heavens opened, and Christ standing at the right hand of God pleading for him, but when they were stoning and bruising him to death? So that the most remarkable experiences of God's kindness that believers get in this world, have been joined to the time of affliction: the consideration whereof should move every Christian to wait on the Lord, and bear his cross with patience.

7. When you are helped to Christian patience and submission under God's hand, it contributes much to the credit of religion, and to the conviction of the world, that there is a certain reality in the truths of the gospel, and a great efficacy in the grace of God which bears you up, and carries you through beyond the strength of nature.

8. O believer, bear up with patience under the cross, for thou hast not long to bear it. God's wrath on the church abideth but for a moment, yea, a little moment, Isa. xxvi. 20, "Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut up thy doors about thee, hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast." Surely a moment, a little moment, which is the smallest part of time, will soon be over; and wilt thou not have patience for a moment? The psalmist supported himself with this consideration, Psal. ciii. 9, "He will not always chide, neither will he keep his anger for ever." The time of indignation will soon be overpast, and the time of consolation will succeed. O believer, the end of all thy trials is near; think on it, and look for it. Is it bodily pain or sickness that is thy affliction? Then consider, the end of it will be either life or death: if death, then what thou sufferest is the last struggle; bear it patiently: those enemies you now see, you will see them again no more. In the mansions above, there is no pain nor crying: the inhabitants there shall never say they are sick; and one hour with them will make thee forget all thy momentary afflictions. If the issue shall be life, you will be ashamed, when well, that you had not more patience whilst sick.

I shall close this direction with the words of the apostle James, Jam. v. 10, 11, "Take, my brethren, the prophets who have spoken in the name of the Lord, for an example of suffering affliction, and of patience. Behold, we count them happy which endure. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord, that the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy."

DIRECT. III.—LET BELIEVERS BE MUCH EMPLOYED IN THE PRAISES OF GOD, WHILE THEY ARE UNDER AFFLICTION BY SICKNESS OR OTHERWISE.

As we should bless the Lord at all times, and keep up good thoughts of God on every occasion; so especially in the time of affliction. Hence we are commanded to glorify the Lord in the fire, Isa. xxiv. 15. And this the three children did in the hottest furnace. So Job blessed God when he had taken away his greatest comforts, Job i. 21. And this is agreeable to that command, 1 Thess. v. 18, "In every thing give thanks." I grant, indeed, we cannot give thanks for afflictions as affliction, but either as it is the means of some good to us, or as the gracious hand of God is some way remarkable therein towards us. In this respect, there is no condition on this side of hell, but we have cause to praise God in, even in the greatest calamities. Hence it was that David, when he speaks of his affliction, Ps. exix. 67, adds presently, "Thou art good, and dost good." And he declares, ver. 65, "Thou hast dealt well with thy servant, O Lord, according unto thy word." Hence Paul and Silas praised God when they were scourged and imprisoned.

Well, then, O believer, obey the command of thy God, and imitate his worthies, by praising God under thy affliction. 1. This practice would be very pleasant and acceptable to God; for as music is sweetest on the waters, so praise is most agreeable to God from an afflicted soul on the waters of trouble. It is a sign of a noble and generous spirit, to sing the praises of God's goodness while his hand is afflicting us. Distress and danger will make the wickedest to pray; but it is a principle of love and gratitude that makes thy soul to praise. 2. It would bring credit to religion, to see saints thankful and praising God under the cross: it would make people say, surely they find sweetness in God and his ways, that we see not; they have meat to eat the world knows not of. And this would invite strangers to come and try a religious life. The joyful praises of the martyrs at the stake, and in the flames, made people go home with love to religion in their hearts. 3. If the issue of your affliction should be death, this employment of praise would be a sweet preparative to fit and dispose you for the work of heaven. Use yourselves much to this heavenly life, and be often trying to sing the song of Moses and the Lamb in time of sickness and trouble; and this would sweeten the thoughts of death and make you incline to be there, where praise is their constant employment.

Quest. "What should be the subject of a believer's thanksgiving and praise under affliction?"

Ans. He hath manifold grounds of praise; as, 1. Upon the account of God's mercies to him through the by-past part of his life. His mercies to thee, O believer, cannot be numbered; compare thy mercies with thy crosses, and thou wilt soon see thy receivings are far greater than thy sufferings. Thou hast had many days of plenty for one day of scarcity, many days of liberty for one day of straits, many days of health for one day of sickness. And are not these to be remembered with praise?

2. And, more particularly, in the greatest affliction, thou hast ground to praise God, O believer, that thou wast born in the land of light, where thou hadst the means of conversion to God, and acquaintance with Jesus Christ; and especially, that God of his free grace made these means effectual to work a saving grace in you, when others are past by. Is not this matter of praise, that he opened your eyes, humbled your soul, and renewed your heart; that he gave you Christ, forgave your sins, and adopted you into his family, and made you an heir of heaven? Oh, what a sad case would it be, if you were yet in your sins, and in the bondage of Satan! If you had conversion-work to begin to, if you had your faith and justification, and interest in Christ, all to seek, and all your preparation for heaven to make;

if you had all this to do with a sick and pained body, and a disordered mind, that cannot command one settled thought, with the terrible views of death and eternity before your eyes! This is the case that God in justice might have left you to. Well, then, ought you not to praise God, that sent his Holy Spirit in time to determine your hearts to close with Christ, and be reconciled to that God you are shortly to appear before; and that those sins, which now would have been your terror, are all forgiven and washed away through the blood of Jesus Christ?

3. Is it not matter of praise, in thy greatest trouble, that thou hast a great high priest, that is passed into the heavens, to provide a mansion with the Father for thee, and to receive thy soul when separated from the body; "that where he is, there you may be also?"

4. You have cause to bless God, that he sends such suitable harbingers, as sickness and trouble, to tell you that death is approaching; and that he should take such pains on you, to wean you from the world, and make you willing to be gone. Many of God's people, that have been averse to dying at the beginning of a sickness, by the increase and continuance of it have been brought to be well satisfied to depart, that they may be with Christ.

5. You have ground to bless God for timing your afflictions so well, that he sent them not till he saw you stood in need of them; he saw a need before them, as 1 Pet. i. 6, and he would not let you want what was needful.

6. You ought to praise God, that he mitigates your trials, and proportions your burdens for your back; that when he takes a rod to you, he hath not made it a scorpion; that when he deprived you of one comfort and enjoyment, he did not strip you of all, and leave you wholly comfortless; that when you suffer in one thing, he hath not made you suffer in every thing, in soul, body, estate, relations, and all together; that instead of afflicting you for a few days, he hath not made your whole life a scene of misery and affliction. Bless God that he punisheth you less, unspeakably less, than your iniquities deserve; that your sick-bed is not hell, your fever is not everlasting burnings, your pain is not the gnawing of the worm that never dieth.

7. You have cause to praise God that your affliction is not so great as that of some others, and even of some that were very dear to God, and had not grieved him so much as you have done. Remember the trials that some have endured, of whom the world was not worthy, which I mentioned before as recorded, Heb xi. Yours are nothing to theirs, nothing to Job's, that eminent servant of God. Observe the difference with thanksgiving and praise.

8. You have reason to bless God for the strength and support he hath given you under affliction. You would soon sink and succumb under a small burden, if he did not support you by his grace; but when he bears you up, the heaviest trial shall not sink you. Have you not met with some afflictions, you have thought at a distance you would never have been able to bear up under them? yet, when they have come, you have found them light and portable, by reason of the strength God hath bestowed upon you.

9. You have ground of thanksgiving, that the mercies and blessings which God hath continued with you, are far greater than those he hath taken from you; for though he hath taken this and that temporal blessing from you, yet he hath not taken Christ from you, nor his Holy Spirit from you; he hath not separated you from his love, nor cut you off from all the hopes of heaven. However great your trials be, yet still there is a mixture of mercy in your lot, which should be matter of praise.

10. You have cause, O believer, to bless God, that all the afflictions he brings on you are in love, and for your profit. All his ways are mercy and truth to you. If he smile, it is in mercy; and if he smite, it is in mercy. God may change his dispensation towards his children, but never his disposition: his heart is still towards them, and the cords wherewith he scourgeth them, are cords of love. Their profit is the great thing he aims at, in all their chastisements, Heb. xii. 10. He designs thereby to reclaim them from their wanderings, cut off provisions for their lusts, make them pant and long for a better state, and cause them mend their pace towards it. Hence David said, "It is good for me that I was afflicted: for before I was afflicted I went astray, but now I have learned to keep thy word," Ps. cxix. 67, 71. From all which it appears you have manifold ground of praise, even in the time of affliction.

DIRECT. IV.—LET THE CHILDREN OF GOD, WHEN VISITED WITH SICKNESS, SET ABOUT ACTUAL PREPARATION FOR DEATH AND ETERNITY.

EVERY believer hath his main work done, and is always in a gracious state, by reason of his union with Jesus Christ, his reconciliation with God through the merits of his blood, and the universal change that is wrought in him by regenerating and sanctifying grace; upon which account every child of God hath habitual preparation for meeting with death. Yet, because frequently, when sickness cometh, there are many things out of order with them, that make death frightful and undesirable, they must set about actual preparation for death, and seek to have their souls made ready for the bridegroom's coming. And here I shall show wherein this actual readiness of believers consists, which should be their proper work and exercise in time of sickness, especially when sickness is lingering, and doth not destroy the use of reason. But beware of thinking that this should be delayed till sickness come. No, no, the time of health is the main working season, and all should be then put by hand as far as possible. But seeing even the best generally find much to do at the very last, I shall give the following advices for your actual preparation:

1. Seeing sickness is a means appointed of God for his people's good, and particularly for fitting them for a better world, labour earnestly to reap the benefit of sickness, seek God's blessing upon it, that thereby you may be helped to discover more of the evil of sin; that you may hate and abhor it the more; and that you may see more effectually the vanity and vexation of the world; and get your heart loosed from all the things of time, and brought to a willingness to be dissolved that you may be with Christ.

2. Seeing a time of death and sickness is the time of your greatest need, beg earnestly of God, for your Redeemer's sake, such special assistance, influences, and operations of his Holy Spirit, as he knows needful for you in your present low and weak condition, in order to carry on and complete your actual readiness for meeting with himself at death, and entering into the invisible world, and being fixed unalterably in your everlasting state.

3. Renew the exercise of repentance, and of faith in the blood of Christ, for removing all grounds of quarrel and controversy between God and your soul. And, in order thereto, review your by-past life, and look into your heart also, and search out every predominant sin and idol of jealousy; for if there be any iniquity regarded in your heart, and unrepented of by you, it may occasion no little anguish and bitterness of spirit in a dying hour. Well, when thou hast discovered sin, humbly confess and bewail it before the Lord, and ask forgiveness for it through the blood of Jesus Christ the Son of God, which cleanseth from all sin. Yea, make confession of all thy sins, and particularly reflect upon the fountain and spring of them, viz. thy original sin. Know the plague of thine own heart, and mourn over it, mourn for the loss and mis-spending of such precious time. Mourn for the unprofitableness of thy life. Now, when the axe is laid to the root of the tree, by sickness, it is high time to mourn for your unfruitfulness under the means of grace and waterings of the Holy Spirit. Mourn for your sinning against such light and love as have been many days displayed to you in the glorious gospel. And, in a special manner, mourn for your sins of omission, which commonly are but little minded by us. Thus mourn for all thy sins, till thou dost water thy couch with thy tears. It is most suitable that death should find every man, even every child of God, in the exercise of mourning and repentance; for they that thus sow in tears, shall eternally reap in joy. But see that your tears run much in the gospel-channel, and flow from the believing views of a crucified Christ, whom you have pierced in your sins. And, in the midst of your mourning, be still aiming to take faith's holds of the clefts of the rock, for sheltering thy soul from the guilt of past sins: say, "Lord Jesus, I have no refuge but thy wounds, no fountain but thy blood, no covert but thy righteousness. And seeing thou freely makest offer of thy merits for my protection, and invitest even the chief of sinners to come unto thee, saying, Look unto me, be ye saved: Lord, I embrace the offer, and flee to thee to cover me." O believer, do this, not once or twice, but do it a hundred times over; do it as often as thou hast breath to draw in the world. Be still breathing to the very last after a crucified Jesus, for relief against the guilt of sin, which thou art always contracting, and wilt be, till the earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved.

4. In order to your actual readiness to go forth to meet the bridegroom, when coming to you by death, you must do as the wise virgins, Mat. xxv. 7, "Arise and trim your lamps." As it is not enough to have a fair lamp of profession, so it is not sufficient to have only the oil of grace in the lamp; nay, or to have it burning in some degree. There is more requisite at this time, that the soul may be actually ready; the lamp must be trimmed, which imports, 1. A supplying it with more oil; you must seek to have your grace increased, to have new degrees, new strength, and new supplies of grace given from God, to fit you for the last conflict with your spiritual enemies, and especially the last enemy, death. 2. It imports a stirring up of the oil, raising the wick somewhat higher: so there must be an excitation of grace, which may be in a low declining condition: you must endeavour to stir and raise it up to a more lively exercise, and more elevated acts. Stir up the gift that is in thee; make the oil burn clear and shine bright. Bring faith, love, repentance, and holy desires, to a lively exercise. 3. This trimming imports the cleansing of the lamp, by taking away the dead ashes that hinder the light, or prevent its burning so clearly as otherwise it would. So you must labour to take away the dead ashes of corruption, that hinder the shining of grace; remove all unbelief, earthliness, deadness, self, and formality, and whatever else doth suppress the exercise of faith, love, and heavenly-mindedness; let all these dead ashes be snuffed away by repentance and mortification.

As you ought to strive earnestly against all those heart-evils in the time of health, so now labour to give them a dead-stroke when death's har-binger gives you a summons.

5. Be diligent in gathering and summoning up all your evidences for heaven and eternal life, that so you may not venture into the dark valley at an uncertainty. The comfort of dying will much depend on the clearness of your evidences; it is therefore your wisdom to examine them carefully, and see if you can say, "I know in whom I have believed; I have consented with my soul to the method of salvation laid down in the covenant of grace. I am desirous that the glory of it should be eternally ascribed to the free grace of God, and the creature be wholly abased in his sight. I have chosen God for my portion, and Christ for my only Saviour; and the happiness which I aim at is, to enjoy God in Christ for ever. And in order thereto, I depend on the Holy Spirit to apply the redemption which Jesus Christ hath purchased to me, and to sanctify me perfectly. There is no sin but what I hate and desire to part with. I would rather have more holiness, than have health, wealth, and all the pleasures in the world. I earnestly desire the flourishing of Christ's kingdom, and prefer Jerusalem to my chiefest joy." If these your evidences be clear, you may cheerfully take death by the cold hand, and welcome its grim messengers, and long to be gone that you may be with Christ. You may say, as Psal. xxiii. 4, "When I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me." You may may go off the stage with the psalmist's words in your mouth, Psal. xxxi. 5, "Into thine hand I commit my spirit, for thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth."

6. Labour earnestly to overcome the love of life and fears of death, so as to be content to part with all things here at God's call. O believer, what is there in this earth to tempt thee to hang back, when God calls thee to depart? while you are here, you may lay your account with many losses, crosses, disappointments, griefs, and calamities, of all sorts. Friends will fail you, enemies will hate you, lusts will molest you, Satan will tempt you, the world will deceive you. Death is the way that the dearest of God's saints, and all the cloud of witnesses, have gone before you; yea, the Lord Jesus your Head hath trod this path, and hath taken the sting out of death, having paved a way through its dark valley, that his people may safely follow him. Hath the Captain of your salvation gone before you, and will any of his soldiers shrink to follow him? Are you content to remain always at the same distance from him, and to enjoy no more of his presence than now you have? Are you satisfied to live for ever with no more knowledge of God, no more love to Christ, no more holiness or heavenly-mindedness than at present you have? Do you not groan under your remaining ignorance, deadness, wanderings, pride, passion, unbelief, selfishness, worldliness, and other sins and lusts that here beset you? And are you not desirous to go to the place where you will be eternally free from them all, and where you will never complain of a dull, dead, or senseless frame of heart, or of any heart weariness, or wandering in duty any more; for the heart shall then be as a fixed pillar in the temple of God, and shall go no more out; the eternal adoration and praises of God shall be the soul's delight and element for ever. By such considerations, strive to conquer the fears of death and desires of life, which are often great clogs to the people of God in their preparation for removing.

7. Be often meditating upon the heavenly glory which shortly all believers will see and enjoy. Be much in the contemplation of the glorious company above; behold Christ upon his glorious throne at the right hand of God, and Abraham, David, Peter, Paul, and all the rest of the faithful ones, with their crowns of righteousness, triumphing about their Redeemer. Think, O believer, how happy will that day be, when thou shalt meet with thy father and thy brethren, and when thou shalt see thy elder brother on the throne, ready to pass sentence in thy favour. What melody will that sentence sound in thine ears, "Come, ye blessed of my father!" What frame wilt thou be in, when he sets the crown of glory on thy head? "O eternally free love!" wilt thou cry, "O Saviour, thou didst wear a crown of thorns, that I might wear a crown of glory: thou didst groan on the cross, that I might now sing. Wonderful free love, that chose me, when thousands were past by; that saved me from ruin, when my companions in sin must burn in hell for ever!" Think, how ravishing it will be to meet with your godly acquaintances in heaven, with whom you prayed, and praised, and conversed here! Will you not then cry out, "O my brethren, what a change is here! this glorious place is not like the poor dwellings we had on earth; this body, this soul, this state, this place, our clothes, our company, our language, our thoughts, are far unlike those we had then! the bad hearts, the body of death, the corruptions and temptations we then complained of, are all now gone. We have no more fears of death or hell, no more use for repentance or prayer, faith or hope; these are now swallowed up in immediate vision, eternal love, joy, and praise." And for thy help, O believer, in meditating on these things, read some parts of the book of Revelation, or cause them to be read to you; and suppose with yourself, you had been a companion with John in the isle of Patmos, and had got such a view of the glorious majesty, the bright thrones, the heavenly hosts, the shining splendour which he saw, the saints in their white robes, with crowns on their heads, and palms in their hands, and heard them singing the song of Moses and the Lamb, and trumping forth their eternal hallelujahs; what a heavenly rapture wouldst thou have been in! Well then, O believer, thou shalt shortly have clearer and more sweet sights than all those which John, or any of the saints, ever saw here upon earth. Surely that heavenly glory is a subject worthy of thy thoughts, and most suitable for thee to meditate on in time of sickness, and when in the view of death.

8. It would also be very suitable at this time, in order to your actual readiness for death, to be frequently looking out and longing for Christ's coming: as Abraham stood in his tent-door ready to go forth to meet the angels that were sent unto him, so should the believer keep himself in a waiting posture at this time. He should be like the loving wife, that longs and looks for the coming of her absent husband, according to his letters to her; by this time, thinks she, he will be at such a place, and against such a time he will be at another place, and so in a few days I will see him. It is the character of believers, they are such as love his appearing, 2 Tim. iv. 8. They desire his coming, Cant. vii. 14, "Make haste, my beloved; even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." Believers should look upon themselves as pilgrims here, wandering in a wilderness absent from home, and at a distance from their father's house; and, in time of affliction, it is very proper for them to be crying, as David doth, Psal. lv. 6, "O that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away and be at rest: I would hasten my escape from the windy tempest." "O when shall the time of my pilgrimage, and the days of my banishment be finished, that I may get home to my country and friends above? Oh! my Lord is gone, my Saviour hath left the earth, and entered into his glory! My friends and brethren are gone to their blessed rest, where they see God's face, and sing his praise for ever: and how can I be willing to stay behind, when they are gone? Must I be sinning here, when they are serving God above? Must I be groaning and sighing, when they are triumphing and dividing the spoil? Surely I will look after them, and cry, O Lord, how long? When shall I be with my Saviour and my God?"

DIRECT. V.—LET BELIEVERS, IN TIME OF SICKNESS, ENDEAVOUR ALL THEY CAN TO GLORIFY GOD, AND EDIFY THOSE THAT ARE ABOUT THEM, BY THEIR SPEECH AND BEHAVIOUR.

IF ever a child of God be active to promote the honour and glory of God, it should be in the time of sickness, and when death may be approaching. And there is good reason for it; for, 1. This may be the last opportunity that ever thou shalt have to do any thing for God, and therefore thou shouldst study to improve it to the utmost. Heaven, to which thou art going, is the place where thou shalt receive thy reward; but thou canst have no access there to advance God's glory, by commending God and Christ, and religion, to sinners, or weak believers. Upon this account, many of God's children have been content to suspend their heavenly happiness for a while, and to stay upon the earth for some longer time. I have read of a certain martyr, when going to suffer, who expressed some sorrow that he was going thither, where he should do his God no more service, to wit, in the sense above explained. And of another, that saith, "If it were possible there could be a place for any grief in heaven, it would arise from the Christian's considering that he did so little for God while he was upon earth." Now is the working season, O believer, be busy while it lasts, according to the example of thy blessed Saviour, John ix. 4, "I must work the work of him that sent me while it is day; for the night cometh wherein no man can work." This consideration should make thee move thyself with the greatest activity, like Samson before his death, who, when he could have no more opportunity to serve God and his church, cried to God and said, Judges xvi. 28, "O Lord God, remember me, I pray thee, and strengthen me this once." And then he bowed himself with all his might, to pull down the pillars of Dagon's temple, being willing to sacrifice his life to the ruin thereof.

2. The holy speech and carriage of dying believers may, through the blessing of God, make deep impression upon the hearts of unregenerate men that are witnesses to them. Those who have derided the people of God for the strictness of their lives, and despised their counsels and reproofs, as proceeding from humour or preciseness; yet have begun to notice their words and actions, when they have seen them on sick-beds, and on the borders of eternity, and to have other thoughts of religion and holiness than formerly they had. Now they think the man is in good earnest, and speaketh the thoughts of his heart; and if ever he can be believed, it must be now. It is most convincing to carnal persons, to see believers bearing up with patience under their sickness;—to hear them speaking good of God.—commending his ways,—and rejoicing in God as their portion, in the midst of their sharpest pains:—to see them behaving as those that are going to dwell with Christ, smiling and praising God, when friends are sighing and weeping about them. This inclines them to think, surely there must be a reality in religion, there is a visible difference between the death of the righteous and of the wicked. Hence a wicked Balaam wishes to die the death of the righteous, and to have his last end like his. It left a conviction upon that young man's conscience, who said to his loose companion, after they had visited godly Ambrose on his death-bed, and saw how cheerful he was, and triumphing over approaching death, "O that I might live with thee, and die with Ambrose!" Nay, such sights might draw them not only to desire to die the death of the righteous, but also to resolve to live their lives. If carnal men saw believers going off the stage with such confidence and joy, as becomes those that are entering into eternal rest with Christ, and those that are going out of an howling wilderness to a glorious Canaan; it might be a powerful invitation to them to go and seek after the same felicity.

3. This likewise would be very edifying and confirming to all that fear God. How much would it contribute to establish them in the practice of holiness, and to quicken them in their diligence in serving and glorifying of God in the days of their health, to hear a dying believer say, "Of all the time which I have lived, I have no comfort now in reflecting upon one hour but what I spent in the service of God. Were I to begin my life, I would redeem time more carefully than ever. One hour in communion with God is far sweeter than many years spent in worldly pleasures. Come here, then, all ye that fear God, and I will tell you what he hath done for my soul. O taste and see that God is good!"

4. Consider the examples of God's children in former ages, how useful and edifying their words have been at such a time, to all round about them. But this head I intend to insist fully upon afterwards.

Quest. "But how shall I behave so as I may glorify God and edify others, when I am sick or dying? I would have some particular directions for it."

Ans. 1. You may do this by your patience under pain, and submission to God's will, with respect to the event, whether life or death. It is stumbling to others, to see believers fretful in trouble, and unwilling to leave the world when God calls them. But it is most convincing and confirming, to see them frankly resigning themselves to God's disposal, saying, "Let God himself choose for me; he is wise, and knoweth best what is needful and most proper for me: I have no will, but God's will." For any man to desire to live when God calls him to die, or to desire to die when God calls him to live, is equally a sign of cowardice: for he that desires to live is afraid to look death in the face; and he that desires to die, would flee from some calamity, and take shelter in death. But he is the most valiant man that can die willingly when God would have him die, and live as willingly when God would have him live; this is true Christian valour.

2. By pious exhortations and warnings to those that are about you. It may be the last occasion you may have of glorifying God this way: O do not lose the season which may be usefully improved for the good of souls. For thus a believer may bring more honour to God, and more advantage to precious souls, by his sickness and death, than ever he did by all his health and life in the world; for their speeches have more weight with people at such a time, than at any other. Hence the patriarchs, knowing the prevalency of such words, urge Joseph with Jacob's dying charge, Gen. l. 16, 17, "And they sent a messenger unto Joseph, saying, Thy father did command before he died, saying, So shall ye say unto Joseph, Forgive, I pray thee now, the trespass of thy brethren," &c. And as we ought to be ready to give good counsel to all when we lie on sick-beds, so especially we should be concerned for children and near relations: they are more affected than others with our sickness, and so will they be with our sayings; our admonitions may do them good, when we are rotting in the dust.

Quest. "What ought to be the subject of our discourses and exhortations to others at such a time?"

Ans. 1. It is very proper to be much in commending the Master you have served, and the excellency of his service, to those that are about you. Tell them of the equity and goodness of those laws which you have obeyed, and of the bounty and faithfulness of that Lord whom you have worshipped, loved, and praised; and of the greatness and eternity of that reward you are going to possess. Let the children of God extol their Father, and his care of them, and kindness to them. Let the ransomed of the Lord magnify their Redeemer, and his wonderful love and sufferings for them. Tell others what sweetness and satisfaction you have found in your own experience in attending God's ordinances, and in secret duties; what comfort you have found in Christ, and the promises of his covenant. And thus let your last breath be spent in exalting and commending Christ and his religion to others.

2. Be warning others of the vanity of this world, and of all its wealth and pleasures. Tell them that they may see by your case, that these things which people are bewitched with in the day of their health, can signify nothing to a sick or dying man; they cannot ease us in our pains, they can afford no peace to a troubled soul, they cannot lengthen our lives one hour, and far less can they save from the wrath of an angry God.

"Oh," may you say, "what a miserable case had I been in at this time, if I had had no better portion than this world, and nothing else to look to but its riches and pleasures! Wherefore, sirs, set not your hearts upon it, but forsake it before you be forsaken by it, and make choice of that which will be supporting to you in the evil day."

3. Be warning them of the evil of sin, and what mischief and deceitfulness you have found in it. Tell them, that though the devil and flesh would tempt you to look on sin as a harmless thing, yet the pleasure will soon be gone, and a sharp sting will be left behind. Sin will appear no light matter, when the soul is going hence into the awful presence of an holy God. You would give a thousand worlds then for Christ, and his blood of atonement to answer for your sins.

4. Tell them of the great difference between the godly and the wicked man's choice. The godly man chooseth the better part that cannot be taken from him; he lays up his treasure in heaven where none can reach it, so that it yields him rich supplies when sickness and death come upon him. But O how foolish is the wicked man's choice, that for one moment's fleshly pleasure, doth lose his immortal soul and everlasting happiness; warn them to mind the one thing needful in time, and not to pamper their bodies for the worms, but to set themselves presently to close with the offers of Christ, and make sure an interest in his righteousness to cover them in the evil day.

5. Be telling them of the evil of sloth and negligence in the work of their salvation; and be exhorting them to mind it, and to do it with all their might. For however some may censure and deride God's people now, for their strictness, diligence, and zeal in the matters of religion; yet, when they come to die, they will be ready to wish that they had been more diligent in salvation-work; that they had loved God, fled to Christ, and had sought and served him with all their hearts and souls; and to cry, "O for a little more time! O if God would recover and try us once more with health, how diligent would we be!" And tell them, that those who have been most serious and painful in salvation-work, yet, when they come to die, do much lament their sloth and negligence; yea, those that have been most reproached by the world for their diligence and fervency, do often wish at that time, "O that we had been a thousand times more diligent and laborious in God's service!"

6. Labour to persuade others of the preciousness of time, the wisdom of improving the time of youth and health, and the great folly of delaying repentance, and putting it off to a sick-bed. Say to them, "I find now, by experience, that a time of sickness is a most unfit season to do any thing to purpose for the soul; my mind is so diverted and indisposed for spiritual work, by sickness and pain, that I cannot attain to any suitable composure for it. And, how miserable were I, if I had all my work to begin at this time! O take a warning, and improve precious time, and especially the day of the gospel, the time of the Spirit's strivings, and the time of youth, which is the most usual season of the conversion of souls, and of bringing sinners into acquaintance with Jesus Christ."

DIRECT. VI.—LET GOD'S CHILDREN, WHEN SICK OR DYING, BE EXPRESSING A GREAT CONCERN FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF THE KINGDOM OF CHRIST, AND OF TRUE RELIGION IN THE RISING GENERATION.

ZEAL, and public spiritedness, for Christ's interest, is very becoming his people in all the periods of their life, but more especially at this time. When Christ is ready to take you into his kingdom in heaven, O be not unmindful of his kingdom on earth. It would be acceptable to God, and pleasant in the sight of men, to see you expressing a warm concern for the rising age, and for promoting the welfare of the souls of your children, and others that survive you; and seeing you can be no longer useful to those you leave behind, by your counsels, examples, or prayers, as formerly; do your utmost for them now. And this concern, the children of God in time of sickness may evidence several ways.

1. By earnest prayers to God, both for the prosperity of his church and the flourishing of religion in general; and also for your children and relations in particular, that they may be a holy seed, and a generation to serve God, and show forth his praise in the world, when you are gone off the stage.

2. By entrusting the care of your children's education to such tutors and guardians as will be much concerned for their souls, and will set before them godly examples and instructions, in their young and tender years.

3. By filling your latter wills and testaments with many pious advices and solemn charges to your children and relations, with respect to their serving God, and worshipping him in their families and in secret, so as they can never look into your testament, and the legacies left to them, but they will hear something that may be affecting, upstirring, and edifying to their souls.

4. By honouring the Lord with your substance and leaving something of what God hath blest you with, to pious uses; particularly for the religious education of the children of the poor, for buying bibles to them, and other excellent books; and for the propagating of Christian knowledge in ignorant places, such as the Highlands and islands, by erecting and maintaining of schools therein: which glorious work is happily begun, and pretty far advanced, by that honourable society at Edinburgh, whose treasurer is ready to receive donations from all such as the Lord pleaseth to move to make a free-will offering for promoting that pious design. Many pious persons have contributed already thereto; and it were desirable that others, whom God hath enabled for it, should mind it before they die: for by fatal experience we may observe, that the most godly parents do not know how their children will employ the estate they leave them, whether as fuel for their lusts, or as oil to feed the lamps in God's sanctuary. It is proper for themselves, then, before they go off the stage, to dispose of some part of their substance, for the glory and service of that God who gave it all unto them.

5. It might contribute to promote piety, and to make the deeper impressions upon the minds of your children and friends, if, under the warnings of death, you should imitate the example of the prophet Elijah, who in his lifetime made a writing, which he procured to be delivered to king Jehoram, after his death, 2 Chron. xxi. 12. So, in like manner, you might write letters, and leave them in the hands of your friends, and executors, full of advices, charges, admonitions, consolations, or threatenings, to be delivered to your children or friends, upon occasion either of their good or bad conversation after your death; which probably would be more regarded by them than the counsels you gave them in the time of your life; for, in some respect, they would be received and read by them as if they were letters from heaven.

DIRECT. VII.—LET THE CHILDREN OF GOD LABOUR TO FORTIFY THEMSELVES WHAT THEY CAN AGAINST ALL SATAN'S TEMPTATIONS AND ASSAULTS, WHICH THEY MAY EXPECT TO MEET WITH IN TIME OF SICKNESS AND AFFLICTION

A TIME of affliction is commonly a time of temptation: for the old serpent knows the fittest season for assaulting the children of God; and he will not be wanting to improve this opportunity of advantage for setting upon the poor soul. When Pharaoh heard that the people were entangled in the wilderness, he pursued them; so when Satan sees a soul entangled with distress and troubles, he thinks it high time to make an attack. He seeks to winnow and sift away the believer's grace, and therefore he comes when the corn is threshing by the rod. When Jacob was smitten in his estate, health, and all other comforts, then this coward falls upon him, and tempts him to impatience, murmuring, and wrong thoughts of God.

At this time, O believer, you have special need to be on your guard, and look out. Reckon always, when sickness or trouble cometh, the prince of this world cometh also. Stand then to your defence, and put on your armour, especially the shield of faith, that you may be able to quench the fiery darts of the devil. You have need at this time to put in practice our Lord's direction, "Watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation." Pray for wisdom and skill to counteract him, and that you may not be ignorant of his devices; and pray particularly for grace to make you proof against all his false representations of God and his providence to you; for he that durst represent Job falsely to an all-seeing and all-knowing God, will, with much boldness, represent God falsely to you, who see and know so little. Ho will be ready to tempt you to think that God is angry with you, and dealing with you as an enemy: thus was Job tempted, Job xxxiii. 10, 11, "Behold he findeth occasion against me, he counteth me for his enemy, he putteth my feet in the stocks, he marketh all my paths." But observe what Elihu answers, "In this thou art not just: God is greater than man. why dost thou strive against him? for he giveth not account of any of his matters." But seeing I spoke before of the wrong thoughts of God, which we are apt to harbour in time of affliction, Chap. II. Direct. III. I shall proceed to speak of some other temptations wherewith Satan assaults God's people when in distress; and furnish some answers thereto.

1. Saith the tempter, "Thou art nothing but a hypocrite; all thy religious performances have been done in hypocrisy, to be seen of men: thou never hast repented, or believed sincerely in the sight of God."

Ans. I acknowledge there hath been much hypocrisy in me, but I hope it is not allowed and reigning hypocrisy; I always wrestle against it, wherefore I am not an hypocrite. I regarded the esteem of men too much, but I hope I valued the esteem of God much more. My faith and repentance are weak, but I hope they are sincere. And whatever defects and short-comings have formerly cleaved to these graces in me, I now unfeignedly repent of all my sins, I look to him that I have pierced, and mourn. I am heartily willing to be justified by the righteousness of Christ alone, and to be cleansed and sanctified by his Spirit; and here I give up myself to Christ as my only Saviour. And this I hope is through grace, true repenting and believing, which God will accept for Christ's sake, whatever my former defects have been.

Tempt. 2. But saith the tempter, "Thy repenitance cannot be true; for thy heart is broken, and thine eyes do not shed tears for sin."

Ans. It is my very great burden, and constant complaint to God, that I cannot attain to a greater measure of sorrow and contrition for sin; but yet it is my comfort that repentance is not to be confined to such degrees and symptoms of sorrow as some do get at. I hope, I can say through grace, that my heart is set against all sin great and small, and I would give all I have in the world to be wholly delivered from sin.

Tempt. 3. Saith the tempter, "But thy day of grace is past, it is too late for thee to think of repenting or believing; God will not accept of thee now."

Ans. But I hope it is not so with me, seeing God gives me a heart that pants after God and Christ in the way of commanded duty. The offers of salvation through Christ are made to all who believe and repent; and late penitents are not excluded from the benefits of these gracious offers more than others.

Tempt. 4. But, saith the tempter, "Thou art none of God's elect; and, if thou be not chosen to salvation, thou canst not be saved."

Ans. Secret things belong unto God; and it were presumption in me to pry into his secret decrees; but one thing I am sure of, that every soul that is chosen to faith and repentance, is also chosen to salvation; but I trust God hath chosen me to the former, and therefore to the latter.

Tempt. 5. But, saith the tempter, "You overvalue your graces and duties, and so they cannot be true and real."

Ans. But I count them all but loss and dung in comparison of Christ. I desire always to be deeply humbled under a sense of my sinfulness and unworthiness, and to abhor every motion that would carry me away from Christ and his righteousness, and would tempt me to rely on my graces or duties, or to put them in the least in Christ's room.

Tempt. 6. "The issue of thy sickness may be death, and thou art not ready, for thou hast no assurance of thy salvation."

Ans. A perfect certainty is not to be expected here; there will be still some questionings, some doubts and fears; but these I resolve not to indulge now, but to break through all, that I may embrace Christ, and be found in him. The desires of my soul are to Christ, and the remembrance of his name; and such, I believe, he will not suffer to perish. "I believe, Lord, help my unbelief."

Tempt. 7. "But thou art a stranger to the invisible world; how wilt thou adventure into that world of spirits, with which thou hast so little acquaintance?"

Ans. But Christ, who is my Head and best friend, is no stranger to it; he is the Lord of that land, and provides mansions for all his people there; and he will receive every one of them home, and lodge them safely. "The spirits of just men made perfect," were once what my spirit now is; they were strangers to that world before they came to it as well as I. But their Head being in it, encouraged them to go to it; and now they rejoice in it as the kindly dwelling-place of all the saints.

Tempt. 8. "But thou art vile, and God is infinitely pure and glorious; how canst thou think of approaching so near to him?"

Ans. Though a weak eye be not able to look upon the sun, yet I hope to be fitted and strengthened for that glorious sight. Besides, God now appears to us in his Son Jesus Christ, where his infinite glory is pleasantly veiled so as saints may behold him. These glorified souls were once vile as well as others; but their Saviour cleansed them, and presented them to the Father without spot or wrinkle. And, whatever be my unworthiness, I am relieved by considering my union with Christ, and looking on the glory and dignity of my Head. Surely God will not despise the members of his dear Son, nor trample on any that are his flesh and bones.

Tempt. 9. "But what will become of thy wife and children, when thou art taken from them?"

Ans. If I trust God so willingly with my soul and my eternal concerns, why may I not trust him with my relations also? Have not I seen how wonderfully he hath provided for others? Doth not every thing in the world depend on his will and pleasure? How easy is it then for God to supply his own?

Tempt. 10. "But still death is terrible to nature, even the king of terrors."

Ans. But my Redeemer hath tasted death for me, and taken out its fearful sting; he hath conquered death, and keeps the keys of death and hell. Wherefore through him will I sing, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

Tempt. 11. "But it is terrible to think of appearing before God's tribunal to be tried and judged."

Ans. But my friend and intercessor will be the judge there. Will Christ condemn the members of his own body, and those he hath so often comforted?

But, besides all these, a holy God may sometimes suffer the tempter to assault his own people in time of their affliction, with his fiery darts and his fiercest battering engines, such as temptations to atheism, blasphemy, despair, &c. whereby their souls may be terribly shaken and sore amazed.

Your relief in this case, is to look to your Head, and remember how he was himself bufffeted by this enemy, and assaulted with the most odious temptations, that he might thereby get an experimental touch and feeling of your condition, in order to his sympathizing with you, and relieving you from this enemy, whom he hath already conquered in your name. But for these things he will be inquired of by the house of Israel. You must act faith on your exalted Head.

CHAPTER IV.

CONTAINING SOME SPECIAL DIRECTIONS TO UNREGENERATE PERSONS WHEN AFFLICTED WITH SICKNESS OR OTHERWISE.

DIRECT. I.—TAKE A SERIOUS VIEW OF THE MISERABLE CONDITION OF A CHRISTLESS PERSON, UNDER SICKNESS OR HEAVY AFFLICTION.

1st. CONSIDER the vast difference between your case and that of a true believer; he hath ground of consolation in the greatest distress, but you have none. However sharp the rod of correction be to him, yet it is in the hand of a Father; but you have to do with an angry and sin-revenging God; and who may stand in his sight if once he be angry? for he commands both the first and the second death, and he can send you both into the grave and hell at once, Rev. vi. 8, "Hell followed the pale horse." Death is the king of terrors, but hell is a thousand times more terrible. When God afflicts his children, he stands to them in the relation of a loving Father; but he deals with you as an incensed Judge. Though he sees it necessary, for their good, to chastise them, yet he doth it with a relenting heart; yea, every stroke goeth as it were to his heart, Isa. lxiii. 9, "In all their afflictions he was afflicted." But when he ariseth to punish his enemies, he strikes them with hatred and detestation, as a man would do to a toad or venomous creature. Though they cry he hath no pity, Prov. i. 26, "I will laugh at your calamity, and mock when your fear cometh."

2d. If your sickness threaten you with death, what a dark and melancholy prospect must you have of your approaching change! Why, O Christless soul, it is what you are wholly unprepared for. The old house falls down about your ears, before you have another lodging provided. When death casts you to the door, you have no where to lay your head, unless it be on a bed of fire and brimstone. O how surprising and fearful will the change be, that death will make on you! A change from earth to hell, from light to darkness, from comforts to terrors, from hope to despair, from the offers of grace to the revelation of wrath; a change from the society of saints on earth, to the company of the damned in hell. Whatever fond hopes of salvation you have now, your hope shall lead you no further than to the king of terrors, and then, "your hope shall be cut off, and your trust like a spider's web," Job viii. 14. Though it cost you much pains to weave and support this web now, it will prove a weak and slender defence to your soul, when death comes with the besom of destruction, and sweeps both you and it away to hell. You will then be taken from all the means of grace you have abused, and be for ever deprived of an opportunity of buying oil; your lamp shall go out at death, and never be lighted any more.

3. In this extremity, you have no where to look to for comfort. O Christless sinner, what will you do in the day of visitation? To whom will you flee for help? Your houses, your lands, your money, your honours, your companions, your relations, will all be miserable comforters to you. Every thing will look black and dismal round about you. If you look without you for help, you may see your friends weeping and lamenting your case; but this will do nothing but increase your vexation and misery. If you look within you for relief, conscience, that before you would not suffer to speak, will meet you with bitter stings and upbraidings. It will bring to your view the sins you had forgot, the time you have mispent, the health you have misimproved, the offers of grace you have refused, the great salvation you have neglected. What folly was it for thee to provoke God and slight Christ, for a little worldly profit, or a little brutish pleasure? Can these relieve thee when the arrows of the Almighty stick within thee, and the terrors of God do set themselves in array against thy soul? In the mean time, the devil that tempted you to your soul-ruining course, will step in and represent your sins in their blackest colours and aggravations, to render you altogether hopeless and desperate. O sinner, thou that refusdest rest from Christ in the day of health and grace, shalt find no ease from the creature in the day of sickness and death. Your sickness will allow no rest to your body, and your sins will permit no ease to your soul. You may expect the fulfilling of that threatening, Deut. xxviii. 65, "The Lord shall give thee a trembling heart, failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind. And thy life shall hang in doubt before thee, and thou shalt have fear day and night. In the morning thou shalt say, Would to God it were even; and at even, thou shalt say, Would to God it were morning," because of the pain of thy body, and anguish of thy spirit.

DIRECT. II.—LET UNREGENERATE PERSONS CAREFULLY IMPROVE THEIR SICKNESS AND AFFLICTION, AS MEANS TO FURTHER THEIR CONVERSION; AND PRAY THAT GOD MAY BLESS IT FOR THAT END.

MANY have begun their acquaintance with God and with themselves in the time of affliction; the furnace is frequently the Spirit's work-house where he forms his vessels of praise. There are many who, while health and strength continue, mind nothing but vain pleasures; one day they go to their games and sports, another to their cups and lascivious company; another day to visit their friends; and thus they spend the whole time of their health and prosperity in sin and vanity. All the warnings, counsels and exhortation of parents, friends and ministers do them no good. They cannot endure to entertain a serious thought of God or Christ, of death, of heaven, of hell, or judgment to come. But, when God casts them into sickness or some great affliction, they, through the blessing of God, begin to come to themselves, like the prodigal, and think of returning again to their Father. Several instances to this purpose might be given. The earl of Rochester is a late one, whose life was notoriously lewd, profane, and atheistical, and who had wickedly employed his wit and parts to the ridicule of religion; yet, when he was afflicted with pain and sickness, and brought to the gates of death, he began to entertain quite other apprehensions than he had done before; he professed he had serious and reverent thoughts of religion and holiness, which before he laughed at; he most earnestly and affectionately warned others to abandon their evil courses, and to live religiously and soberly, and to look upon religion as the greatest reality in the world; he retracted all his impious and profane language, wherewith he used to reflect on the ways of godliness, and willingly attested all this under his hand.

Pray then for the Divine blessing on your sickness, that it may contribute to the conversion of your soul, which it doth several ways: 1. By opening men's eyes to get a true sight of things, to behold religion in its true shape, and sin in its proper colours; hence the rod is said to give wisdom, Prov. xxix. 15. They who have mocked at religion, and made light of sin all their days, have been taught by bodily sickness to change their tune. Then they begin to have an esteem for the bible, and to value and send for a pious minister, and to desire the prayers of the people of God; now they perceive sin to be bitter as gall and wormwood; they lothe and abhor that which they liked before; now the word of God makes a deep impression on them, and particularly such a word as that, Jer. ii. 19, "Know therefore and see that it is an evil thing and bitter, that thou hast forsaken the Lord thy God."

2. Sickness helps to set the word preached home upon the heart. When God speaks to us in the day of health and prosperity, we often give him a deaf ear, Jer. xxii. 21. But when distress comes, it brings the word of God and his ministers to our remembrance, as it brought Joseph to the remembrance of his brethren, Gen. xlii. 21.

3. Sickness contributes to loose a man's heart from the world, and to cool his love thereto; whereby a great hindrance of conversion is removed out of the way, and the man is made to say, "How vain and helpless are the world's comforts to me now! Those things I delighted in formerly, are tasteless to me at this time. There is no portion can suit my soul's needs, but God himself."

4. It spurs a man on to prayer that formerly neglected it. When the prodigal is brought to distress, he says, "I will arise and go to my father." He forgot his father before, but now he will address him, Hos. v. 15, "In their affliction they will seek me early." Thus the Lord frequently begins and promotes the conversion of souls to himself. And, O sinner, if this be the fruit of thy sickness, it will not be unto death, but the glory of God.

DIRECT. III.—BE CAREFUL TO OBEY GOD'S VOICE IN THE ROD, AND BEWARE OF SLIGHTING IT.

EVERY sickness hath a message from God, and his voice you ought to hearken to with reverence and attention, Mic. vi. 9. What saith he to you at this time? O sinner, he saith, "Retire from the world, think on death and eternity, abhor those lusts and idols which God is smiting you for, flee speedily to the strong-hold: repent and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out." This is God's voice to you, and consider how provoking it will be to him, if you slight it.

1. You will provoke God to slight your voice when you cry to him, and stop his ear against the voice of your supplications, Zech. vii. 13.

2. You will provoke God to cease from being a reprover to you, so that he will speak to you no more.

3. You will provoke him to bring heavier judgments on you; yea, so to draw his sword of justice against you that he will sheath it up no more, as he threatens, Ezek. xxi. 5.

4. God may break off all intercourse and correspondence with you, as with those, Ezek. xx. 31. "As I live, saith the Lord God, I will not be inquired of by you."

5. He may seal you up for ever under your sins, hardness and pollution; and say to you, as some we read of, Ezek. xxiv. 13; Hos. iv. 7;

Rev. xxii. 11, "Because I have purged thee, and thou wast not purged, thou shalt not be purged from thy filthiness any more, till I have caused my fury to rest upon thee. Ephraim is joined to his idols, let him alone. He that is filthy let him be filthy still." He that is hardened against the voice of my rods, let him be hardened still. Well, then, O sinners, while God is in speaking terms with you, hearken to his voice, and obey it; say, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?"

DIRECT. IV.—CAST BACK YOUR EYES UPON THE SINS OF YOUR BY-PAST LIFE, AND LABOUR TO BE DEEPLY HUMBLED FOR THEM BEFORE THE LORD.

SEEING you are summoned to prepare for going to the judgment seat of God, where your soul is to receive its final sentence; labour to prevent the terror of that appearance, by your judging yourself before-hand. And this you must do, by summoning yourself before the bar of conscience, examining narrowly into your state, accusing and condemning yourself for your sins. And see that you be impartial in this work, willing to know the truth, and discover the worst of your case. You must see and be duly sensible of your danger, otherwise you cannot think to escape it. Take a narrow view of your sins in their nature, number, aggravations, and deservings. And, in order to this, if thou hast any measure of strength for it, let the exposition of the ten commandments in our Larger Catechism be distinctly read over unto thee. Make a pause upon every question, and say within thyself, "Have I not omitted what is here required by God? and have I not committed what is here forbidden by God? How often have I repeated these sins? How long have I lived in the practice of them? O! do not so many years' sins need a very serious repentance, a very deep humiliation? O! doth not such a vile sinner as I, stand greatly in need of Christ to be my cautioner and ransom for such a vast number of sins? Will not their weight press me eternally down to the lowest hell, if they remain unpardoned, and be laid upon my back?" Wherefore view them closely, and confess them particularly before God.

1. In the first place, bewail thy original sin, the fountain of all thy actual transgressions, as did David, Psal. li. 5, "Behold I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me."

2. Acknowledge and mourn over the sinful out-breakings of thy life, whereby thou hast dishonoured God, and grieved his Holy Spirit; and especially sins against light.

3. Be humbled for thy sins of omission, for neglecting of commanded duties, particularly for the neglect of prayer in secret, and of family-religion.

4. Mourn for the loss of precious time. Alas for the time of youth mispent, many Sabbath-days trifled away!

5. Lament thy long slighting of Christ, and salvation through his righteousness, which so pressingly hath been offered to thee in the gospel.

6. Bewail thy stifling the convictions, and quenching the motions of the Spirit, and thereby provoking him to depart from you.

7. Mourn for thy unthankfulness to God for mercies and deliverances, which might have allured you to repentance and newness of life.

8. Confess thy stubbornness under former afflictions, which hath provoked God to send new trials upon you.

9. Be humbled for thy earthly-mindedness, in that thou hast all thy days been careful and cumbered about many things, and hast neglected the one thing necessary.

10. Mourn for the lateness of thy repentance, and thy prodigious folly in delaying so long to bethink thyself, and turn to the Lord. "Oh how unwisely have I acted, to mispend the time of health, and delay so great a work till now, that I am laid on a sick-bed! And now, if I die before I am converted, I am lost for ever. O Lord, I am ashamed and confounded at my madness and folly, and have no excuse to plead for myself, but must stand afar off, with the poor publican, and smite upon my breast, and cry, "God be merciful to me a sinner."

DIRECT. V.—FLEE PRESENTLY TO JESUS CHRIST BY A TRUE FAITH, AND CLOSE WITH HIM AS OFFERED TO YOU IN THE GOSPEL.

ART thou sensible, O sinner, of thy grievous guilt and ill-deservings before God? then do not despair; for Jesus Christ, who has offered to Divine justice an all-sufficient sacrifice for sin, is offering himself to thee, saying, O distressed sinner, "Look unto me and be saved; turn unto me, why will you die? Come unto me, heavy-laden soul, and I will give you rest. He that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast out." Will not so gracious words, such moving calls, melt thy heart within thee, and make thee cry to him, "Lord Jesus, I flee unto thee as my refuge, for deliverance from sin, and protection from the wrath to come; I look to thy wounds, I trust in thy righteousness, I depend on thy merit, I lie at thy feet, and this I am resolved to do as long as I have a breath to draw in the world."

DIRECT. VI.—CALL FOR THE ELDERS OF THE CHURCH THAT THEY MAY PRAY OVER YOU IN YOUR SICKNESS.

THIS is the apostle James's directions to the sick, Jam. v. 14. He does not say, if any be sick, let him send for the physician, but for the elders or ministers.

It is true physicians are to be called, but not in the first place. It was Asa's fault, that in his disease he sought not the Lord, but to the physicians; and, alas! how many follow his example! ministers are only called for in the last place, and very often when the time is past, the sick being at the point of death, and scarce capable to speak or hear. But if you desire to reap benefit by the instructions and prayers of ministers, call for them timeously, and open your case unto them; seek their counsel, and beg for their prayers. It is their office to teach and pray for you, and they have authority to offer salvation unto you through Christ, and to minister comfort to them that are cast down; wherefore a blessing may be expected on their administrations and performances more than others. Hence God said to Abimelech of Abraham, Gen. xx. 7, "He is a prophet, and he shall pray for thee." And to Job's friends, concerning Job, xlii. 8, "Go to my servant Job, and he shall pray for you, for him will I accept; lest that I deal with you after your folly." And,

Lastly, Remember, that as the apostle James enjoins the sick to call for the elders to pray over them, so at the same time he directs you, James v. 16, to confess your faults one to another, Christian to Christian, one friend to another, the people to their minister. Not that this gives any warrant to the papists for their auricular confessions, which they force upon all men, to their priests, as a satisfaction for sin, and whereby they rack their consciences, when they feel no distress, to confess their most secret sins, to enumerate them all under pain of damnation, and which they use as a politic to dive into the secrets of princes, states, and all private persons: but, as Luther, Calvin, Beza, and many other orthodox divines teach, it is very profitable and necessary for those that are inwardly troubled with a sense of their sins, to ease and disburden their consciences, by confession of them to a faithful minister of Christ, in order to their receiving suitable counsels and consolations from them, such as Christ has left in his word for the use of contrite-hearted penitents.

Thus let every man in sickness use all appointed means for preparing his soul for a future state. Thy preparation will by no means hasten death, but sweeten it to you. Death must surely have a most formidable aspect to an unprepared sinner; he may salute it, as Ahab did Elijah, "Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?" Why? it brings heavy and doleful tidings to him. But a prepared soul may salute death, Welcome, O my friend! thou bringest me tidings of great joy; everlasting deliverance from sin and all the bitter fruits of it. I shall never complain of these any more.

CHAPTER V.

CONTAINING DIRECTIONS TO THE PEOPLE OF GOD, WHEN THE LORD IS PLEASED TO RECOVER THEM FROM SICKNESS AND DISTRESS.

DIRECT. I.—IT IS VERY PROPER, BOTH UNDER SICKNESS AND AFTER IT, TO EXAMINE IF THE AFFLICTION BE SANCTIFIED TO YOU, AND HATH COME FROM THE LOVE OF GOD.

It would be very comfortable for us to know that the afflictions which God visits us with, are not the punishment of a judge, but the chastisement of a father; that they do not proceed from wrath but from love; that they are not curses, but blessings to us. Now the best way of knowing this is by the effects which they work and produce in us through the blessing of God.

1. Canst thou say, that thy affliction hath humbled thee in the sight of God, and made thee confess and bewail thy sins and strayings from God as the procuring cause thereof? hath it been like Moses's rod, that smote the rock, and brought out much water? Did you water your couch with tears, and mourn humbly before God, for all thy God-provoking sins? then it is a good sign sickness is sanctified.

2. Doth thy affliction drive thee nearer God; and cause thee aim at closer communion with God in duty than formerly, saying, "however careless and overly I have been in duty in time past, it is surely good for me now to draw near to God?"

Then thy sickness is a blessing unto thee.

3. Affliction is sanctified, when the corruption and deceitfulness of the heart is the more discovered and laid open to the view of the soul; so as the man is made to abhor himself in dust and ashes, and cry out as the leper, "unclean, unclean." I never could have thought my heart so wicked as now I see it.

4. It is a sanctified sickness that purgeth the heart, and changeth the life, and gives a dead stroke to thy sins and idols, and makes thee to loathe and abhor them more than ever, saying, with Ephraim, "What have I to do any more with idols?"

5. It is a blessed rod, when grace is more quickened and stirred up thereby, and the man turns more fruitful in holy duties and good works; when it is a budding and blossoming rod, like to Aaron's, Num. xvii. It is recorded there of Aaron's rod, that it brought forth buds, bloomed blossoms, and yielded almonds. So it is happy with us, when our rods and sickness produce in us not only the buds of a profession, or the blossoms or some beginnings of a reformation, but even cause us to yield almonds, fruit savoury to God. Is conscience become more tender with respect to sin? Are we more jealous over our hearts?

Are we more fervent in prayer, more lively in praise, more mortified to the world, more desirous of communion with God? then may we say with David, "It is good for us that we have been afflicted;" and with Hezekiah, "thou hast, in love to my soul, delivered it from the pit of corruption."

DIRECT. II.—MAKE CONSCIENCE OF OFFERING TO GOD THE SACRIFICE OF THANKSGIVING, UPON HIS RECOVERING THEE FROM SICKNESS, OR ANY DISTRESS.

THE psalmist gives us this direction from God, Psal. l. 14, 15, and he shows us that it was his own practice in such a case, Psal. cxvi. 17; ciii. 1—3, &c. The command is just, let us obey it;—the example is excellent, let us imitate it. Praise is comely for the upright. Here I shall give some motives and advices.

1. God, who is the author of all thy mercies and deliverances, gives you tongues for this very end, that you may bless and praise him for those mercies, Jam. iii. 9. Hence man's tongue is called his glory above the rest of the creatures, Ps. lvii. 8. There is none in this creation so endued and qualified for praising God as man is. Angels have reasons and minds whereby they adore and admire God's goodness and excellency, but have no tongues to praise him; beasts have tongues without speech or reason to use them: but man hath both reason and speech, that he may both admire God's goodness, and with his tongue sound forth God's praise. See then, O believer, that you use your tongue to answer the end of your creation. God loseth his due rent of praise from the rest of the world, but he expects it from his children, whom he hath formed for this end, and on whom he hath bestowed many distinguishing favours.

2. The sacrifice of thanksgiving is most pleasing and acceptable to God. He loves your tears and prayers, O believer, but much more your praises. How well pleased was our Lord with the poor leper Samaritan, that returned and gave him thanks for curing his bodily distemper? Luke xvii. He dismissed him with a special blessing, and cured him of his soul's diseases, as well as of his body's. And, therefore,

3. Consider that thankfulness for thy mercies received is a more profitable course for yourself; for it is the way to get more and better blessings bestowed upon you, according to Ps. lxvii. 5, 6, "Let the people praise thee, O God. Then shall the earth yield her increase; and God, even our own God, shall bless us." Thanksgiving for former mercies is a kindly way of petitioning for new favours, and God will understand it in this sense.

4. God is so well pleased with the duty of thanksgiving, that he honours it to be the eternal work of heaven. Whereas other graces, such as faith, hope, and repentance, will then be melted into love and joy for ever; so other duties of worship, such as reading, hearing, and prayer, will then be changed into that of praise and thanksgiving: the glorified company above will never be weary of this work; and shall we not delight in it now; when God is calling us to it by so many new mercies?

In the next place, that thou mayest offer the sacrifice of thanksgiving to God for thy recovery, with gracious acceptance, I shall lay before you the following advices:

1. See that your heart be touched with a sense of the greatness of the mercy and of the goodness of God manifested therein. We must put a due value upon our mercies, and have our hearts affected with God's kind dealing towards us in them, if we would be rightly thankful to God the author of them. Hence it was that David called upon his heart and all within him, to bless the Lord for his benefits, Ps. ciii. 1; and in Ps. cxxxviii. 1, he saith, "I will praise thee with my whole heart." As in an instrument of music, the more the sound comes out of the belly of it, it is the more sweet, so our praise is the more acceptable to God, when the heart is full of gracious affections.

2. Let your praise be the native result of faith and love in your soul, otherwise it will be but an empty sound. Faith is necessary to draw by the veil, and show us the perfections of the visible God, who is the spring and author of all our mercies; love gives a deep sense of his goodness, enlargeth the heart towards God, and opens the lips to show forth his praises.

3. Study to have a deep sense of your own unworthiness and ill-deservings at the Lord's hand, upon the account of your sins and ill-improvement of former deliverances, saying, with Jacob, Gen. xxxii. 10, "I am not worthy of the least of all thy mercies."

4. Look above instruments and second causes, and do not ascribe your recovery to physicians or outward means, but to the Lord, the prime author of it, whose blessing alone it is that gives efficacy and success to the appointed means, and by whose mercy only we are spared and brought back from the gates of the grave. To this the apostle attributes Epaphroditus' recovery, Phil. ii. 27, "Indeed he was sick nigh unto death, but God had mercy on him." Hence we are told, 1 Sam. ii. 6, "The Lord bringeth down to the grave, and bringeth up."

5. Observe narrowly the remarkable circumstances of the Lord's goodness, and the sweet ingredients of thy mercies: as, for instance, (1.) How discernible the Lord's hand was in thy deliverance, which obligeth thee to say, Surely this is the finger of God! This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in mine eyes. (2.) How thy deliverance came to thee as the return of prayer, that makes thee say, Surely he is a prayer-hearing God. (3.) How deliverance came when there was but little ground to hope for it. See how Hezekiah observed this ingredient in his recovery from sickness, Isa. xxxviii. 10, 11, "I said in the cutting off of my days, I shall go to the gates of the grave: I am deprived of the residue of my years. I said, I shall not see the Lord, even the Lord in the land of the living: I shall behold man no more with the inhabitants of the world;" ver. 15, "What shall I say? He hath both spoken to me and himself hath done it." Sometimes God sends deliverances to his people when they are most hopeless, and saying with the captives in Babylon, Ezek. xxxvii. 11, "Behold our bones are dried, and our hopes are lost, and we are cut off for our parts." (4.) Remember how the extremity of thy distress was God's opportunity of sending relief. Abraham never forgot the seasonableness of God's appearing for him in his extreme need upon mount Moriah, when he called the name of the place Jehovah Jireh for preserving the memorial of it: "in the mountain of the Lord it will be seen." So doth David, Ps. cxvi. "I was brought low, and he helped me."

6. Let the present deliverance bring all former mercies to thy remembrance, that so thou mayest praise God for them all, whether they be national or personal mercies, public or private, spiritual or temporal. New mercies should revive the memory of the old, and all of them should come above board at such a time; so doth the psalmist direct, Psal. cv. 2, "Sing to the Lord, talk ye of all his wondrous works." And what he directs others to, he practiseth himself in such a case, Psal. cxvi. 12, "What shall I render to the Lord for all his benefits towards me?"

7. Be ready to communicate to others an account of the Lord's kind dealings towards you, and the sweet ingredients of his mercies; and particularly of his sending spiritual deliverance to your soul, as well as outward deliverance to your body, when he is pleased to do so: and do this in order to recommend the service of God to others, and to engage and invite them to assist you in blessing and praising the Lord. We see how David observed his soul's deliverance, Psal. cxvi. 7, 8, and declares his experience to others, Psal. xxii. 22, "I will declare thy name unto my brethren, in the midst of the congregation will I praise thee." Psal. lxxvi. 16, "Come and hear, all ye that fear God, and I will declare what he hath done for my soul."

Lastly. Remember always to give thanks for mercies to the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, as directed, Eph. v. 20. Your spiritual sacrifices are only acceptable to God, when you offer them up by Jesus Christ, 1 Pet. ii. 5. As we must seek all our mercies in Christ's name, so we must give thanks also for them in his name. He is the Mediator of our praises as well as of our prayers. Believers have not one mercy, but what comes swimming to them in Christ's blood, and is the fruit of his death and purchase to them; and therefore he is to be owned and looked to in the receiving of every mercy. And as Christ is the only Mediator for conveying blessings and mercies from God to us, so he is the sole Mediator for conveying all our services and spiritual sacrifices to God. God accepts of them only as they are perfumed by Christ's meritorious sacrifice and potent intercession.

DIRECT. III.—WHEN THE LORD IS PLEASED TO GRANT THEE ANY SIGNAL MERCY OR DELIVERANCE FROM TROUBLE, BEWARE OF FORGETTING THE LORD'S KINDNESS TOWARDS THEE.

FORGETTING of God's remarkable kind providences, is an evil we are naturally prone unto, when we are in a prosperous state. Hence it is, that the Spirit of God gives so many cautions against it in his word; and the saints of God so solemnly charge their own souls to beware of it, as in Psal. ciii. 2, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits; who healeth all thy diseases, who redeemeth thy life from destruction." Forget not his benefits, but carefully and thankfully preserve and treasure them up in thy memory.

It was usual for saints under the Old Testament, to set up some visible monument to remind them of God's singular favours to them; they erected stones, and built altars, to be memorials of the mercies they received, and put names on the places for this end. Let all this teach you to guard against this evil of forgetting the Lord's kind providence in recovering you from seasons of sickness.

You are guilty of this evil, when you do not duly value the mercy, but let it pass as a turn of common providence. When you let the impression of the mercy wear soon off your hearts; when you make a bad use of it, or do not rightly improve it to God's glory, and your own soul's good, when you do not put on new resolutions to walk more exactly, live more fruitfully, and serve God more holily and humbly; then are you guilty of forgetting his benefits.

This is an evil most grievous and provoking to a good and gracious God, as is evident from the many heavy complaints he makes of his people for it, as in Judg. viii. 34; Psal. lxxviii. 11; evi. 13. Wherefore watch and pray against it.

DIRECT. IV.—INQUIRE AFTER THE FRUITS OF RIGHTEOUSNESS, WHICH ARE THE GENUINE EFFECTS OF AFFLICTION IN THE CHILDREN OF GOD, WHO ARE DULY EXERCISED THEREBY.

THE apostle speaks of these fruits, Heb. xii. 11, as natively following upon sanctified afflictions, and a kindly exercise of spirit under them. And therefore it is your duty to inquire if they be produced in you.

1. The increase of true repentance is one of those fruits which is the product of sanctified trials. Job found it in himself on the back of his afflictions, Job xlii. 6, "Now I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." It would be happy if we could find our hearts more soft and melting upon the view of sin, after we have been in the furnace of affliction.

2. Another fruit is the improvement of faith. The afflicted believer is taught to look to, and depend more upon God, for help in time of need, and less upon the creature. He now sees that vain is the help of man in the day of calamity, and that God in Christ is the only proper object of the soul's trust. This was the fruit of the apostle's affliction, 2 Cor. i. 8—10, "We were pressed out of measure, above strength, insomuch that we despaired even of life. We had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God that raiseth the dead: who delivered us from so great a death, and doth deliver: in whom we trust that he will yet deliver."

3. Humility, and low thoughts of ourselves, is one of the fruits of righteousness which sanctified affliction yields. How proud and lofty was Nebuchadnezzar before his affliction, Dan. iv. 29, 30. But afterwards he is made to own God, and humbly submit to him as his supreme and uncontrollable sovereign, and to acknowledge, that those who walk in pride he is able to abase, ver. 27. This was God's design in the various trials of his people Israel in the wilderness, Deut. viii. 16, "That he might humble thee, prove thee, and do thee good at thy latter end." See then, O believer, if this fruit be produced in thee.

4. Another fruit is the spirit of prayer and supplication. This was visible in the psalmist's case, after God had delivered him from the sorrows of death, and heard his voice, Psal. cxvi. 2, "Therefore, says he, will I call upon him as long as I live." O, saith a true believer, God's mercy to me in trouble, and his sending me relief when I cried to him, will make me love prayer the better, and engage me to be more diligent in it all my days; for I still see I have daily need of his helping hand.

5. Heavenly-mindedness is a fruit of sanctified affliction. Before the man was inclined to that language, it is good for us to be here, let us build tabernacles in this lower world, but now he turns his tongue, and changeth his thoughts, and saith, with the psalmist, "It is good for me to draw nigh to God. Arise, let us depart, this is not our rest. The world is nothing but the house of our pilgrimage, heaven only is our home."

6. Another fruit of sanctified trials is greater love to God than formerly. How much was David's heart warmed with love and gratitude to God, upon the back of his affliction, so that he wants words to express the affections of his soul! Psal. cxvi. 1, 8, 12, "I will love the Lord because he hath heard my voice, I was brought low, but he helped me. Thou hast delivered my soul from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling. What shall I render to the Lord for all his benefits towards me?"

7. Learning and keeping of God's word, is a fruit of sanctified affliction, Psal. cxix. 67, 71. Let us inquire if this fruit be produced in us after sickness. Do we attend to the word more closely? Do we believe it more firmly? Do we embrace its offers more earnestly? Do we rely on its promises more steadfastly? And do we live more in the expectation of that glory which the word reveals to us? Then it is good for us that we have been afflicted, for we have learned more of God's word.

8. Tenderness of conscience is a happy fruit of sanctified trouble, when the believer, after it, becomes exceedingly afraid of sin, and of making new wounds in his conscience. He cannot think of adventuring again upon any known sin, for the smart of former wounds, and the pain they occasioned in his soul, when distress lay upon him, makes deep and lasting impression on his mind, as it did on the afflicted church, Lam. iii. 19, 20, "Remembering mine affliction and my misery, the wormwood and the gall, my soul hath them still in remembrance, and is humbled within me." Now, such fruits of righteousness are an evidence we have been suitably exercised under affliction. O to find them produced in us after sickness is over!

DIRECT. V.—BE CAREFUL TO PERFORM THOSE RESOLUTIONS, ENGAGEMENTS, OR VOWS, YOU HAVE COME UNDER IN THE TIME OF SICKNESS; AND WALK SUITABLY TO THEM.

As a time of sickness and affliction is a proper season for making vows to God, and binding our souls with resolutions to mortify sin in the heart, and purge it away from the life, and to be diligent in duty, and walk more humbly with God; so a time of recovery from sickness is a proper season for paying and performing these vows. This was the royal psalmist's practice in such a case, Psal. cxvi. 6, 16—18, "I was brought low, and he helped me. Truly I am thy servant, I am thy servant. I will offer to thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving. I will pay my vows unto the Lord now in the presence of all his people." Now, for your assistance in this matter, I offer you these few advices.

1. Defer not to pay your vows, but be speedy, and take the first opportunity to pay them. Delays in this case are most dangerous: Solomon, that wise man, was sensible of this, which made him give this advice, Eccl. v. 4, "When thou vowest a vow unto God, defer not to pay it."

2. Be still jealous of thy heart, which is prone to deal treacherously with God after affliction is over: the Israelites' practice is a sad instance of this truth, Psal. lxxviii. 34, &c., "When he slew them, then they sought him, and they returned and inquired early after God," &c. "Nevertheless they did flatter him with their mouths, and they lied to him with their tongues: for their heart was not right with him, neither were they steadfast in his covenant." The purposes of many in affliction, are like the vows of mariners in a storm; they are the first things which they forget and break, when once they get safe ashore. However penitent some seem to be in sickness, yet, when they recover from it, they soon return to their old sins again. They are like metals in a furnace; they melt and turn liquid, while in it, but when out, they soon return to their old hardness. There is good reason for that caution the Lord gives us, Mal. ii. 16, "Therefore take heed to your spirit, that ye deal not treacherously."

3. Cry continually for strength from above, to enable you to perform your vows. The psalmist took this course, and found it successful, Psal. exxxviii. 3, "In the day when I cried to thee thou answeredst me, and strengthenedst me with strength in my soul." And forget not, O believer, that God hath treasured up strength for thee in thy Head and Surety, Jesus Christ; wherefore be still borrowing from him, for the performing of all thy engagements, 2 Tim. ii. 1, "My son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus." Put thy treacherous heart in thy Surety's hand; for though thou art weak, yet thy Redeemer is strong. Whenever then you first perceive your heart begin to start aside from God, be sure to check it, and look up to God in Christ, for strength to secure it against treachery and perfidious dealing: cry with the psalmist, "Be surety for thy servant for good."

4. Guard diligently against thy predominant sin, the sin that hath most easily beset thee, the sin that was most bitter and uneasy to thee in the day of distress. Keep a narrow eye upon it now; for if once that sin be got vanquished, the rest will the more easily be put to flight.

5. Be frequently meditating on thy vows, and on the condition thou wast in when they were taken on, and study to keep alive in thy heart the same apprehension of things after sickness, which thou hadst in the time of it. How vain and comfortless did the world and its vanities then appear to thee! How awful were the truths of God on thy spirit! How far preferable was the loving-kindness of God to thee than life! How precious was Christ then in thy eyes! O that your judgment, thoughts, and impressions of these things may continue still the same!

6. Keep up the impressions of the preciousness of time, that you may diligently improve it; and shake off sloth and idleness. Remember what a view you got in the time of sickness of long lasting eternity, and what a trouble it was to you to look back, and see how much time you had lost in sin and vanity. When sometimes we are brought to the brink of eternity, the near views we then get of its vastness and unchangeableness, are sometimes so awful and amazing to us, that we are ready to think, though we had Methusalem's years to live, it would be unreasonable wilfully to mispend one hour of them all. Well then, is sickness over, our time so short, and so little of it remaining behind? Will we be so foolish, as to be lavish of it still, and trifle it away as before?

7. Set a special mark upon all these sins, whether of omission or commission, that made death look grim and ghastly upon you in the time of sickness, and against which you resolved; and see to get every one of them amended and removed. Remember and consider how sad it will be for you, if sickness find you again in the very same sins which formerly stung you. What will you say to conscience, when it shall challenge you? How will you look death in the face, if it should find you living in the very same sins you formerly mourned for, and promised against? Death would then be the king of terrors to thy soul indeed.

O then mind thy vows, and say, with the psalmist, Psal. lvi. 12, 13, "Thy vows are upon me, O God; I will render praises to thee. For thou hast delivered my soul from death; wilt not thou deliver my feet from falling, that I may walk before God in the land of the living?"

CHAPTER VI.

CONTAINING DIRECTIONS TO THE UNREGENERATE, WHEN THEY ARE RECOVERED FROM SICKNESS, AND RESTORED TO HEALTH.

DIRECT. I.—SEEING THE AFFLICTIONS OF THE WICKED ARE UNSANCTIFIED, IT IS NECESSARY YOU EXAMINE WHAT SORT OF AFFLICTION YOURS HATH BEEN, AND WHAT FRUITS IT HATH PRODUCED IN YOU.

I HAVE, in the preceding chapter, shown that the afflictions of believers are fatherly chastise-ments, proceeding from love; that they are sanctified, and yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness. I have given the marks of sanctified afflictions, and mentioned the happy fruits which they produce in the children of God.

On the other hand, it is necessary to let Christless persons know, that their afflictions are of a different kind; they are even punishments from God as a Judge, proceeding from wrath; they are unsanctified to them, and produce no fruits but what are bitter and unsavoury.

Well then, O Christless soul, thou hast reason to suspect the worst concerning thy sickness, that it hath not been sanctified, and its fruits are not good. O then labour to know the truth of the matter, and thou mayest be humble under a sense of thy misery, and flee to Jesus Christ for relief. And for thy assistance in this inquiry I shall give some marks of unsanctified afflictions.

1. If sickness hath not humbled thee under a sense of thy sins, the procuring cause thereof, nor anywise hath weakened sin in thee, nor reclaimed thee from it, but it remaineth in thee as strong as ever; it is a sign thy affliction is unsanctified. This was the case of those of whom God complaineth, Jer. ii. 30, "In vain have I smitten your children; they received not correction." As if he had said, The physic I gave them did not purge out sin; nor weaken corruption in the least. They have been stricken, but not grieved for sin: the fire hath burnt round about them, but they have not laid sin to heart, that kindled the flame.

2. It is a mark of unsanctified affliction, when it hath no influence upon a sinner to bring him to a serious communion with his own heart concerning the state of his soul, and to inquire in what terms he stands with God that afflicts him. God's voice by affliction is that in Haggai, i. 7, "Now consider your ways." In the day of adversity consider where you are, what you are, what you have done, what is the meaning of the rod, what will be the issue of it through eternity, in case it hath a commission to cut the thread of life. Now when a man remains stupid and careless about these important matters, and never noticeth the voice of affliction, so as to inquire seriously about his soul's condition; "Am I under a covenant of works or a covenant of grace? Am I a child of God, or an enemy of God? Have I fled to the city of refuge, or am I still in a shelterless state? Am I still under a cloud of wrath, or am I brought under the banner of love?" I say, where there are no such inquiries, the affliction is unsanctified.

3. It is a certain sign of unsanctified affliction, when a person grows worse by it, and revolts the more he is stricken, like these, Isa. i. 5.

Quest. "When may it be said that a person grows worse by affliction?"

Ans. When the sinner's heart turns harder than it was before; so every plague in Egypt increased the plague of hardness in Pharaoh's heart. It fares with many hearts as with iron that is often heated in the fire, and quenched in the water, it still increaseth in hardness. 2. When a person giveth way to impatience and murmuring against God while he afflicts him. 3. When the lusts of the heart grow more strong and impetuous, and afterwards rage the more, that they have been stopped in their course by affliction. In such cases a person grows worse by the rod.

DIRECT. II.—CONSIDER THE GREAT DANGER OF NOT BEING BETTERED BY SICKNESS, AND OF NOT COMPLYING WITH THE VOICE OF GOD'S ROD.

God's voice by his rod loudly calls sinners to repentance, and fleeing to the Lord Jesus Christ for refuge from wrath. Now, when this voice is not hearkened to, but men go on in their secure and sinful course as before, God is highly provoked, and the issue will be terrible: For,

1. Though sickness be removed, and the furnace of affliction be removed for a time; yet the wrath that kindled it continues still to burn. And you have ground to fear lest you be ranked among those who are the generation of God's wrath, against whom he will have indignation for ever.

2. If lesser rods do not awaken you, you may expect greater and sorer judgments are coming on you. Yea, God may cause them to come rolling thick upon you, as waves and billows in a storm, one upon the neck of another. The great depths, both above and below, may be opened together; the displeasure of God, and wrath of men, may conspire and meet to pour out themselves as water-spouts upon you at once; and to whom then will you look for help?

3. The Lord may give over dealing with you, or using any further means to reclaim you; he may refuse to correct you any more, or bestow a rod upon you for your good, and say of you, as of Ephraim, Hos. iv. 17, "Ephraim is joined to his idols, let him alone."

4. The Lord may give you up to spiritual plagues and judgments; and indeed this commonly is the result of obstinacy and incorrigibleness under outward rods. When Israel would not hearken to God's voice, he gave them up to their own hearts' lusts, Psal. lxxxi. 11, 12. Now, these plagues are the severest of all others. External judgments are God's rods, but spiritual judgments are his swords, which pierce the very soul. Blindness of mind, hardness of heart, scaredness of conscience, vile affections, and a reprobate sense, are the very forerunners of hell and damnation. Those who are impatient and unfruitful under outward afflictions, have cause to tremble lest God be provoked to inflict those spiritual judgments.

5. Be assured, though God spare you long, yet the glass of his forbearance will at length run out. God's patience towards sinners hath a term and bound, over which it will not pass. The time will come when a long-suffering God will at last say, My Spirit shall no longer strive; and the angel will cry, as Rev. xiv. 7, "The hour of God's judgment is come." You that abuse God's patience, and presume upon it, his treaty of peace will end with you in a little, and the master of the house will rise up and shut to the door. Then patience will come down, and justice will ascend the stage, and trample upon, and triumph over all that abuse divine patience. Sodom was a wonder of God's patience for a long time, but now it is a lasting monument of his anger.

6. If you be not bettered by God's rods or sparing mercies, then your preservation at present will be nothing but a reservation for the day of God's wrath. And the longer your cup of sin is a filling, the fuller shall the cup of God's wrath be for you: by your impenitence and abuse of God's patience, you treasure up wrath for yourselves against the day of wrath, Rom. ii. 4. And though you be delivered from some judgments, you are reserved for worse; yea, for seven times worse, according to Lev. xxvi. 23, 24. Nay, there is a ruining blow designed against you, both soul and body, as soon as your cup is full; and the axe is already laid to the root of the tree, Mat. iii. 10. One blow of God's axe will cut off for ever.

Remember this, O sinner, though God's hand be lifted off you at present, and his messenger, death, be for a little recalled, yet he will quickly return, and knock so loud at your door, as not to be refused. And, what will you do in the day of visitation? how ghastly must the pale horse be, when hell follows him at his heels? and, how hot and fiery must that hell be, which is inflamed and blown up by so long impenitence and abuse of patience?

DIRECT. III.—WONDER AT THE PATIENCE OF GOD IN SPARING SUCH HELL-DESERVING SINNERS AS YOU ARE, AND BE THANKFUL FOR IT.

HATH a long-suffering God preserved the thread of your life, when it was almost snapped asunder by the violence of sickness? hath he freed you from racking pains under which you are groaning? nay, saved you from the grave and hell, into which you were falling? and have you not cause of wondering and thanksgiving? To move you to it, consider these few things:

1. How miserable had you been through all eternity, if your sickness had carried you off to another world in your sins? You had been howling with lost spirits, under endless and ceaseless torments, and for ever cut off from these hopes and offers of mercy you now have. Then the master of the house would have had the door so barred against you, as it could never have been opened again to you, knock as you would, Luke xiii. 25.

2. Consider how heavily you had burdened his patience with your heinous sins, and frequent relapses thereinto: and that after convictions, calls, and various rods sent to reclaim you; so that he was put to say, as in Amos ii. 14, "Behold I am pressed under you, as a cart is pressed that is full of sheaves." He was overburdened with your sins, so that the axle-tree of patience was ready to break, and let you fall into hell; and yet, behold he bears with you still.

3. Consider how soon he could have eased himself of the load, and shaken you off into the pit of destruction. In a moment could he have done it, and yet he bears many years with your sins, that are so grievous to him. Yea, it is with a sort of reluctance that he eases himself of sinners, after he gets the utmost provocation, Isa. i. 24. "Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries."

4. How ready is he to turn away his anger, and relieve sinners from destruction, when in their distress they make but a show of repentance and turning unto God! as we see in Psal. lxxviii. 36, 38. He, like a tender-hearted prince, calls back the warrant for their execution after it was gone forth.

5. Consider how much many Christless sinners are beholden to Jesus Christ for sparing mercy. He is represented by the dresser, Luke xiii. interceding that the fruitless fig-tree might be spared and tried some time longer, after orders given to cut it down. Were it not for Jesus Christ, O sinner, however much you forget and slight him, you had surely been in hell long ere now. How often doth he obtain another year, and after that another for the unfruitful sinner, and unthankful abusers of divine patience!

6. Consider how sparing mercy hath distinguished you from many others, who lived not so long, nor sinned so much as you have done. God hath wounded the hairy scalp of many, and taken them away in their youth; when he hath continued you to manhood, and perhaps to old age; though your sins and ill-deservings be greater than those of many, on whom he hath long since taken vengeance. God hath left many also tossing and groaning on beds of pain, when he hath eased and helped you up. O then return, like the thankful leper, and magnify the God of your health. Hath God distinguished you from others by his goodness? it becomes you to distinguish yourselves from others by your thankfulness. O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness! undeserved and distinguishing goodness!

To move you to this, let me set the example of Hezekiah before you, Isa. xxxviii. and there see how thankfully and affectionately he remembered the Lord's mercies in recovering and delivering him from the bitter affliction he had been under. "I said I am deprived of the residue of my years, I shall behold man no more with the inhabitants of the world. Like a crane or swallow, so did I chatter; I did mourn as a dove. Behold, for peace I had great bitterness; but thou hast in love to my soul delivered it from the pit of corruption. The living shall praise thee as I do this day." Yea, he was so overcome with a sense of the Lord's patience and mercy towards him, that he is at a loss how to express it, ver. 15. "What shall I say? he hath both spoken unto me, and himself hath done it."

Let all, who are recovered from sickness, study to imitate that good king in holy admiration and thankfulness to the God of their life.

DIRECT. IV.—STUDY TO IMPROVE THE SPARING MERCY AND GOODNESS OF GOD TO YOU IN A RIGHT AND SUITABLE MANNER.

O SINNER, hath God brought you back from the gates of death, and brink of hell, restored you to health, and given you a new offer of mercy and salvation through Christ in a preached gospel, which you formerly despised? Strive now to improve the Lord's patient and kind dealings towards you with the utmost care, and abuse his patience no longer. And, in order thereunto, take the following counsels.

I. Be deeply humbled for your former obstinacy and impenitency, notwithstanding of God's gracious and penitent dealing. O let the sparing mercy and goodness of God toward thee, lead thee to repentance, which is the native design of it, according to Rom. ii. 4, "Despise thou the riches of his goodness, forbearance, and long-suffering, not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance?" As if he had said, "Dost thou not see, O man, the kind providence of God in sparing and recovering thee from sickness, taking thee by the hand, and pointing out to thee to go to thy closet, and to mourn and weep for all thy by-past sins, and particularly for thy mispending the time of thy health, and abusing of the Lord's patience?" The consideration of David's goodness and forbearance towards Saul, melted Saul's heart, for as hard and rugged as it was, and made him to lift up his voice and weep, and say to David, 1 Sam. xxiv. 17, &c. "Thou art more righteous than I; for thou hast rewarded me good, whereas I have rewarded thee evil." And thou hast showed this day, how that thou hast dealt well with me: forasmuch as when the Lord had delivered me into thine hand, thou killest me not. For, says he, if a man find his enemy, will he let him go well away?" O, far more reason hast thou, O man, to weep and cry, "God hath found me his enemy, yea, in my enmity and sins, fighting against himself, he had me on a sick-bed, and on the very brink of hell, and the least touch of his hand would have thrust me in: but yet he hath spared his enemy, and let me go well away. O, will not these cords of love draw me, and his matchless goodness invite and hire me to repent? Can any consideration in the world be more powerful than this to melt my hard heart into tears of holy shame and sorrow for my stiffneckedness and rebellion against a gracious and long-suffering God? Away with these cursed God-provoking sins of mine? Down with these weapons of rebellion! Let me never lift them more against such a merciful sovereign!

II. Zealously improve the time, which God in his long-suffering hath lengthened out to you, in working out the salvation of thy soul. Have you so long been loading the patience of God with your sins? Have you many a day been grieving his Holy Spirit, by trifling away your time, slighting his motions, and venturing on sins against light? O then, beware of burdening his patience any more; but diligently hearken to every motion of God's Spirit, and of your own conscience, for the time to come. You have much work to do, and but little time to do it in; therefore lay hold on every opportunity for carrying it on. The consideration of the much time you have already lost and mispent, should make you the more diligent in what remaineth. How much of it have you lost in youth? How much in ignorance? How much in negligence? How much in worldliness? How much in pastimes? How much in idle words? How much in actual sins and provocations against God? And now it may be near the evening of your day. And will you not spend the evening, which God is mercifully lengthening out, with extraordinary care and diligence? If a traveller lose the beginning of the day, he must travel the faster, in the evening, otherwise he may fall short of his journey, and have his lodging to seek when night comes. Paul had mispent much of the beginning of his life; and this consideration, when his eyes were opened, stirred him up to be more diligent in the service of God, so that he was more zealous than any of the rest of the apostles. O man, follow his example, and trifle no longer in the work of God. Art thou not convinced thou hast squandered away enough of his precious treasure of time already? And, wilt thou also mispend and throw away the little that remains? O be not so foolish.

III. Be careful to raze all false foundations, and build your hopes of salvation upon the only sure rock, Jesus Christ. Let it not discourage thee to dig to the foundation, that so much of thy day is lost; for it is better to do it late than never. Remember how miserable is the condition of that house which is built upon the sand, Mat. vii. 27, "For when the flood comes, and the storm arises and beats upon it, great and dismal will the fall of that house be. Do not build your hopes of heaven upon God's absolute mercy, upon your convictions, upon your freedom from gross sins, upon your prayers or tears, upon your morality and just dealings with men: though these be necessary and excellent in themselves, yet they are false foundations for you to build the hopes of your justification and salvation upon, seeing they are wholly insufficient to bear such a weight. However much these things have been esteemed and valued by you formerly, in the matter of justification; yet if you resolve to be a wise builder, you will let them all now go, yea, count them all but loss and dung that you may win Christ, our only hope; build on him alone, and be found in him, not having on your own righteousness, which is but filthy rags.

Well, then, raze and tear up every false foundation, dig deep, till you get to the rock Christ. Dig deep into the holy law and nature of God; dig till you see the infinite strictness of divine justice, the unspeakable evil that is in sin, the hidden vileness and abominations of the heart, your own inability to do any thing for your help and relief. Dig yet further, till you see the infinite fullness and freeness of God's grace in Jesus Christ, that suitable remedy that answers all a poor sinner needs. Dig deep, and dig still on, till you get to this rock; let your cry be still to God, Lord, lead me to the rock Christ, and his all-sufficient righteousness, only. Act faith upon this rock, rely on it, build all your hopes on it, and say, "this is my rest for ever; here will I dwell, for I have desired it. Lord, the desire of my soul is only to Christ, and to the remembrance of his name. His name is a sweet ointment poured forth; therefore do the virgins love him."

IV. If you would rightly improve the sparing mercy and goodness of God, let it lead you to repentance and reformation of life. Turn from all these sins, whether of omission or commission, now in the day of health, which conscience challenged you for in the time of sickness. Mind Christ's caution and warning to healed sinners, John v. 14, "Behold thou art made whole; sin no more, lest a worse thing befall thee." O let sin die with thy sickness; and do not relapse into thy former security and former ways. Beware of returning with the dog to thy vomit, and like the sow that is washed to the wallowing again in the mire of thy former sins and uncleanness; lest being entangled and overcome again with the filthiness which thou now hast escaped, thy latter end prove worse than thy beginning.

Lastly, And to sum up all I shall say in this chapter, be careful to redeem time, and active in providing for an eternal state. O prize and value the mercy of health and strength, more than ever. Sympathise with those who are still lying on sick-beds, and under languishing distempers; neglect not to pity and pray for them. Remember the distressed case you were in yourselves, when you had no rest in your bones, when wearisome nights were appointed to you, and you were full of tossings to the dawning of the day. Consider how slippery is your standing. Though the late storm of trouble be over, yet the clouds will return after rain.

CHAPTER VII.

CONTAINING DIRECTIONS TO THOSE SICK PERSONS, WHO ARE APPARENTLY IN A DYING CONDITION, AND DRAWING NEAR TO ANOTHER WORLD.

I HAVE already, in the first, third, and fourth chapters, given several directions concerning our submission to the will of God, making preparation for death, calling for ministers, edifying others by our discourse, settling our worldly affairs, &c. which are very proper for dying persons; and therefore I shall not repeat them, but proceed to speak of other things. Only let me add this word; have you hitherto neglected to make your wills, settle your worldly affairs, send for the ministers to discourse with, and pray for you; delay it no longer, but do it speedily, while you have the use of your reason and understanding. And what I have more to say, take it in the following directions.

DIRECT. I.—CONSIDER, WHEN DEATH STARES YOU IN THE FACE, THAT NOW IS THE TIME, IF EVER, TO EXERT THE UTMOST ACTIVITY IN PREPARING TO MEET WITH IT.

ALAS, it is to be regretted that the most part of men neglect their souls, mispend their life, misimprove their health, and leave undone the work for which they were created, preserved, and enjoyed in the gospel. Surely a nearer prospect of death and judgment cannot but be uneasy to such persons. What a melancholy thought must it be for a dying man! "Oh! I had all my time given me to make preparation for endless eternity; and, alas, I never minded it till now, that I must leave the stage of this world. Is there any hope for such a careless and miserable sinner?" I acknowledge the case is sad, but yet it is not remediless nor desperate; seeing there is a sacrifice provided for your sins, and there is an all-sufficient Saviour in your offer, who never did cast out any humbled soul that came to him for mercy. You have great reason indeed to abhor and condemn yourself before God, for your sin and folly; yet despair not but believe, whatever be your sins, your dangers, your fears, and temptations, that Jesus Christ is both able and willing to save to the uttermost all that come to God by him, and that his grace aboundeth more than your sin aboundeth. O how glad would devils and damned souls in hell be, if they were but in your case, and had your offers and hopes! how diligently would they improve the time of mercy! O be persuaded then to spend the little time that now remains, with the utmost care, in making penitent confession of sin to God, and applying the blood of Christ for pardon. Nay, even the best of God's people have need to be diligent at this time in making actual preparations for dying. God is now saying to you, as Joshua did to the Israelites, Josh. i. 11, "Prepare your victuals, for within three days ye shall pass over this Jordan, to go in to possess the land which the Lord your God giveth you." Lay in provisions for your passing over this Jordan of death: you know not how rough this passage may be.

I shall give some motives to press this diligent and active preparation; and therefore consider,

1. The short time of your life that remains is all the time you have for working out your salvation. What you do for attaining heaven, or avoiding hell, must be done now, or never; for there is no work nor device in the grave whither thou goest, nor is there any coming back to this world to amend what hath been done amiss. Dying is a thing you cannot get a trial of, it is what you can only do once, and no more, Heb. ix. 27.

2. Be diligent now; for as soon as death gets commission to cut you off, it will execute it: it will not spare you, nor allow you one minute more time to prepare for eternity. The most merciless enemies have sometimes been overcome by the prayers and tears of such as, on their knees, begged a little more time to prepare for another world; and hearkened to their requests: but this enemy, death, will not grant one moment's respite.

3. Consider that your eternal state and condition will be according to the state in which you die. Death will open the doors either of heaven or hell to you, in one of which you shall take up your eternal abode. As the tree falls at death, so will it lie through eternity.

4. Consider what a serious and awful matter it is to die, and go into another world, for then you will have immediately to do with God your judge; there will be no veil then between him and your soul. You will then enter into a world of spirits, wherewith you are so little acquainted: you are frightened now to go into a room alone that is said to be haunted by a spirit; how frightful then must the case of those be, who are hurried into a world of spirits, not knowing but devils must be their companions for ever! Surely then it is your interest to give all diligence now, to make your acquaintance with the Lord of that world, before you enter into it.

5. Put forth thy utmost activity for thy soul now; for, to be sure, Satan will put forth his utmost against it. If thou be in a Christless state at this time, he will use all his efforts and stratagems to keep thee from Christ; either by flattering thee that thy state is good, thereby to lull you asleep in sin and security, or by telling thee, it is out of time to help matters with thee, thereby to drive you into despair. The devil will leave no method unattempted to ruin thy soul, when death is near; for he knows his time is short: and, if he catch not the soul then, he will never get it: and neither can he hurt it hereafter; for, if once it enter heaven, he can trouble it no more.

If thou art a believer in Christ, Satan, thy malicious enemy, will not fail to attack thee, at this time, with all his might; for though he may know he cannot keep thee out of heaven, yet he will labour to render thy passage towards it as dark, tempestuous, and uncomfortable, as possibly he can. But it is the believer's happiness, this cruel enemy is under a strong chain, and cannot do all he would; for Jesus Christ is the good shepherd, that hath undertaken for all his sheep. Nevertheless, by his wise permission, this adversary may sometimes give great disturbance to a dying saint; which calls thee to the greatest diligence and watchfulness at this time. It is the observation of one, that as the devil is most busy at the conclusion of a duty, as of prayer, that the Christian may be most disturbed and distracted, when he is to close up all in the name of Christ, and so all his desires be frustrated; so he is most busy in the conclusion of our days, and when death is at hand, seeking by temptations, distractions, and false imaginations, to do us all the mischief he can, and all because he knoweth his time is short; according to that word, Rev. xii. 12, "The devil is come down, having great wrath, because that he knoweth he hath but a short time." He may fitly be called the wolf of the evening, mentioned in Jer. v. 6, in regard he comes forth most fiercely in the evening of men's lives, to set upon their precious souls. Yea, so busy is he sometimes with believers under dangerous sickness, seeking to overthrow their faith and assurance, that it is the observation of a good man, that he seldom seeth a sick saint, followed close with temptations, recover of that sickness; for Satan, knowing he hath but a little time, proves as uneasy to him as he can. Hence that great man of God, Mr. Knox, said, when he came to die: "In my lifetime, the devil tempted me to despair, casting my sins in my teeth; but now, in my sickness, he tells me, I have been faithful in the ministry, and so have merited heaven. But blessed be God, who wrought these texts into my mind, 'Not I, but the grace of God in me. What hast thou that thou hast not received?'" The children of Israel had never such hot work from their enemies, as when they just came to enter into the promised land.

What need then hast thou, O believer, to be diligent in thy preparations on a dying-bed to quicken grace, put forth thy utmost strength, bring all the assistance thou canst from the Captain of thy salvation, when thou hast such a cruel enemy to encounter with! Now is the time for action, though yet it will be your wisdom to leave as little to be done at this time as possible.

DIRECT. II.—CONTINUE TO THE LAST IN THE EXERCISE OF TRUE REPENTANCE AND HUMILIATION FOR SIN.

POSSIDONIUS, who wrote the life of Augustine, said that he often heard him say in his health, that repentance was the fittest disposition both for dying Christians and ministers; and for himself, that he died with tears in his eyes, weeping for sin. When death approacheth nearest, we should thus stir up ourselves to give sin the most deadly blow of any we have given it all our life. As it is laudable to die forgiving sinners that have wronged us, so also taking revenge upon sin that hath injured a gracious God. The apostle tells us, 2 Cor. viii. 11, that indignation and revenge attend true repentance. Wherefore, as Samuel took vengeance on Agag a little before his death, and Moses, at God's command, avenged the children of Israel of the Midianites, just before he was gathered to his people, Num. xxxi. 2, and dying Samson gave the most fatal blow to the Philistines, of any he had given them before; so a dying Christian should take the severest revenge on sin at last, which hath so often through his life dishonoured God, pierced Christ, and grieved his Holy Spirit. It is the last opportunity you will have to show your indignation at it, and therefore do it effectually.

Again, consider, it is old sins unmourned for, that many times keep believers so much in the dark, when they come to die. These raise many thick clouds about their evening sun, and hinder them from going off the stage with such comfortable assurance of God's love, as otherwise they might attain to. These very much hindered Job's peace and settlement in the day of affliction, as he complains, Job xiii. 26, "He makes me to possess the iniquities of my youth." It is a sad thing when young sins and old bones meet together. O that young people would mind this in time! You are doing that now which will abide with you to age, if not to eternity. Sin must be bitter some time or other, for God calls it a root that bears gall and wormwood, Dent. xxix. 18. Israel could not have peace nor success while there was an Achan in the camp; so neither can you have consolation or assurance, while any sin lies unreckoned for in the conscience. Make a thorough search then into old sins, and mourn over them. We find Paul frequently calling over the sins of his life, and even those he was guilty of before conversion: "I was injurious, a blasphemer," &c. whereby he obtained much inward peace and consolation. Be often looking back to old sins, with inward sorrow and faith in Christ's blood, if you would have a death-bed easy and soft to you.

DIRECT. III.—BE MINDFUL OF ALL ACTS OF JUSTICE AND CHARITY WHICH MAY BE INCUMBENT UPON YOU AT THIS TIME.

It is great wisdom in men to settle their worldly affairs in time of health, that so their minds may be free for spiritual exercises, and not disturbed with earthly cares and business when they come to a dying-bed; but, if this hath been neglected hitherto, it must not be omitted now. I have given directions about it, Chap. I. Direct VI. so that I shall say little here, only be careful to do justice to every man, as much as in you lieth; and particularly, 1. By making a just and rational provision for your wife and children. 2. By ordering the payment of all your just debts, without defrauding any of your lawful creditors. 3. By making restitution, in case you have wronged any man. If justice be not done in these matters, how can your souls be disburdened of guilt?

In the next place, forget not the acts of charity, which God requires of all the professors of the gospel.

1. Seek reconciliation with your neighbours, where any difference or mistakes have fallen in; that so you may die in peace and charity with all about you.

2. Be ready from the heart to forgive those that have done you any wrong. If the natural sun should not go down upon our wrath, much less should the sun of our lives; if you carry an unforgiving spirit with you into another world, how can you expect to meet with a forgiving God there? When he hath expressly declared, Mat. vi. 15, "If you forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive you your trespasses." O then, imitate your glorious Saviour, and his martyr Stephen, who at their death begged mercy from God, for those that mortally hated them, Luke xxiii. 34; Acts vii. 60.

3. If the Lord hath given you substance, honour the Lord with it, by leaving some part of it to the poor, and to pious uses. I have pressed this once and again before; but I mention it frequently, because it is much forgotten by dying persons in our age. Remember, it is not left arbitrary to you to give or not, as you please: no, for God charges it upon you as a duty: yea, a debt that you owe to him, 1 Tim. vi. 17, 18, "Charge them that are rich in this world, &c. that they do good, be rich in good works, ready to distribute." And he pronounceth them blessed who consider the poor, Psal. xli. 1. I grant that people are not to leave all their works of charity to a death-bed: these should also be minded in our lifetime, so as to make our own hands our executors, and our own eyes the overseers of our charitable projects: but surely it is a proper season for showing charity to God's poor, when we are leaving them, and cannot have occasion for showing it more. Remember what is recorded of Dorcas after her death, Acts ix. 36, that she was a woman full of good works and alms-deeds. And her friends, ver. 39, showed the effects of her charity to Peter after her death. All which is written for our example and admonition, that we may be rich in such good works, that our friends may have them to show after our death. Surely it is a sign of the degeneracy of the age, and that religion is on the declining hand, when people generally fall so short of the zeal and piety of their fathers in these matters.

4. It would be a commendable work of charity in dying persons, to be giving many good counsels to their relations and children, and to be putting up many fervent prayers to God for them. So Christ, when near to death, committed his spiritual children to his Father, and earnestly begged his protection and care of them, John xvii. 11, "I am no more in the world, but these are in the world: keep them through thy name, keep them from the evil," &c. In like manner cry to God for your children, "Lord, thou hast graciously given them to me, I now restore them back to thee. They were born to me once, O that they may be born to thee a second time! I am leaving them in the midst of snares and temptations, O that it may be their happiness to be the preserved in Jesus Christ! keep them by thy power, through faith unto salvation. O take them within the bond of thy covenant, and be thou their Father to protect, direct, and provide for them. Give them a name in thy house better than of sons and daughters, that I may meet with them at thy right hand with everlasting joy."

Lastly, Be suitably concerned also for the whole church of Christ, and especially for those that are in affliction, that God may loose their bonds, send them liberty and prosperity in his due time. "Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion, build up the walls of thy Jerusalem. Peace be within her walls, and prosperity within her palaces."

DIRECT. IV.—LABOUR WHAT YOU CAN TO OVERCOME THE LOVE OF LIFE, AND FEARS OF DEATH: THAT YOU MAY ATTAIN TO WILLINGNESS TO DIE, AND TO LEAVE THE WORLD, WHEN GOD CALLETH YOU TO IT.

It is no wonder that a wicked man, or one that hath no interest in Christ, be unwilling to die: Why? He is affrighted with the guilt of past sins, and the fears of future torments; and it is impossible to be rid of these till he become a true believer in Christ. No man hath ground to welcome death but a true believer; yet it is to be regretted, that so many of them should appear unwilling to leave this world, which is nothing to them but a wilderness and weary land. Lot's soul was vexed and troubled in Sodom, and yet he was loth to leave it; so some believers, when called to leave a vexing world, show much hankering towards it, and would linger behind. This proceeds partly from nature, which dreads dissolution, and partly from the weakness of grace. But, O let all God's children labour to overcome this aversion, and go forth to meet death half-way, and bid it welcome. And, for their help in this matter, I shall lay before them the following arguments.

1. Consider how little reason a believer hath to be much in love with this present life. (1.) It is a sinful life; sin dwells in your nature, breaks out in your life, and pollutes all your duties. How often have you groaned under this burden; and should you not be glad to be eternally delivered from it? (2.) It is a life of diseases and infirmities; and should you not be willing to be cured of them all at once? (3.) It is a life of temptation: Satan is still harrassing thee; and should you not be desirous to be out of his reach? (4.) It is a life of persecutions from the wicked: they bate reproach, and injure you many ways; and is it not desirable to be "where the wicked cease from troubling, and where the weary be at rest?" (5.) It is a life of clouds and darkness: your sun is often veiled, and your evidences obscured, which occasions many bitter complaints; and should you not desire that time, when the day shall break, and all shadows fly away? (6.) It is a life of calamities and fears: it is like a stormy sea, where one wave rells on the back of another; and when one calamity is past, we often may fear a greater is coming; and sometimes the heavens turn so black and gloomy, that we fear a hurricane of judgment is ready to blow. And should you not bless God, when he comes by death to house your souls, and set you out of harm's way? It is in mercy that God takes away the righteous from the evil to come, Isa. lvii. 1. So dealt he with Josiah, 2 Kings xxii. 20, "I will gather thee to thy fathers, and thou shalt be put into thy grave in peace, and thine eyes shall not see all the evil which I shall bring upon this place." So it is observable, that Methuselah died the very year before the flood; Augustine a little before the sacking of Hieppo; Pareus just before the taking of Heidelberg. Luther observes, that all the apostles died before the destruction of Jerusalem. And Luther himself died before the bloody wars broke out in Germany. Thus God frequently hides his people from the temptations and troubles that are coming on the earth. Why? He sees many of them not in case to endure them; and, therefore, he in mercy takes them away from a tempting and sinning world, to a land of holiness and rest. While we are here we live in a world that lies in wickedness; every sense of the body betrays the soul into sin; the poor soul can scarce look out at the eye and not be infected, nor hear by the ear and not be distracted, nor smell at the nostrils and not be tainted, nor taste by the tongue and not be allured, nor touch by the hand and not be defiled.

O believer, what is this life that thou art so fond of? It is but a living death, or a dying life. It is full of grief for things past, full of labour for things present, and full of fears for things future. The first part of our life is spent in folly, the middle part is overwhelmed with cares, and the latter part of it is burdened with infirmities and age. And what gain we by the prolonging of this life? Nothing but to do more evil, see more evil, and suffer more evil. And should a Christian be unwilling to be rid of those grievances?

2. Consider that dying is appointed as the way, and the only way, to glory: there is no way to enter the promised land, but by crossing the Jordan of death. And should not a stranger desire to be at home with his friends, though he hath a rough way and stormy sea to pass? Is there any home like heaven, where your incomparable friend Christ is? O what a happiness is it to be with Christ, and to see him as he is! How happy do you think Peter, James, and John were, in being taken up to mount Tabor, to be eye-witnesses of their Saviour's transfiguration. But, O believer, death procures a greater happiness to you; it ushers you to mount Zion, where you shall not only see your Saviour whiter than the snow, and brighter than the sun, but yourself transfigured with him, made like him, and eternally secured of his presence. The three apostles saw but two prophets; but you shall see all the prophets, all the apostles, all the patriarchs, all the martyrs, all the holy persons you once conversed with on earth, and in general all the saints in heaven, each of them shining as the sun; and how sweet will their company be? O how soon will the trifles of the world vanish, and all its pleasures be forgot, when once the believer gets a view of that captivating glory above! When the shepherds heard but some few notes of the angels' songs, who praised God at the nativity of our Saviour, they presently left their flocks, and ran to Bethlehem to behold the child Jesus lying in a manger; but much more cause hath a believer to leave all the pleasures of the world, and run to behold an exalted Jesus sitting on the throne of his glory, with all his saints and angels singing praises around him.

If Cato and Cleombrotus, two heathens, after reading Plato's book on the immortality of the soul, did voluntarily, the one fall on his sword, the other break his neck from a precipice, that they might the sooner come, as they fancied, to partake of those joys; what a shame is it for Christians, who have a far surer and clearer discovery of these things from God's own book, to be found unwilling to enter into these heavenly joys, when their blessed Redeemer calls for them thither.

3. Consider how willing Christ was to come from heaven to earth for you; and, should you be unwilling to remove from earth to heaven for him? Yea, for yourselves, for the gain is yours. O did Christ assume your nature, become obedient to death, and purchase an inheritance for you with his blood; and, will you be backward to go and take possession of it? O for a Christ-like obedience at death!

Lastly. Consider what a reproach is cast on Christianity by a believer's unwillingness to die. For Christians to pray, and speak much of Christ, of heaven and glory, and yet be unwilling to enter into that glory; what is it but a misbelieving of God and a tempting of strangers, to think there is no reality in religion?

Quest. "Since death is not easy to grapple with, how shall I attain to this blessed disposition, and a willingness to die?"

Ans. 1. Be frequently putting forth the acts of faith upon the righteousness of Christ; and believe that Christ died to bring in a perfect righteousness for believers, that they all may be complete in him. Now, why should a believer be afraid to appear before God in Christ's righteousness, which is so pleasing and acceptable to him? Rev. xiv. 4, 5. They are said to be without fault before the throne of God. If a believer were to appear before God, in his own righteousness, clothed with his own duties and performances, it would be dreadful to think of dying; but to have the white garment of an elder brother to put on, gives another view of death. Alas, it is our neglecting the daily exercise of faith, in the righteousness of Christ, that makes the thoughts of death so unwelcome.

2. When you attain to peace and reconciliation with God, labour to preserve it. Be stating and clearing counts with God every day, and watch against those sins that wound conscience, waste comfort, and grieve the Spirit of adoption. When we think God is displeased with us, we will be afraid of going to him.

3. Study to be more denied to the enjoyments of this life, and to use them with an holy indifference; otherwise there will be an unwillingness to leave these things.

4. Labour to be deeply sensible of the burden of indwelling sin and corruption, and the workings thereof in your hearts; and this will make the thoughts of death welcome, because it eternally delivers you from it.

5. Seek further discoveries of the loveliness of Christ, and the daily exercise and increase of your soul's love to him: for it is the nature of love to long after communion with the person that we love.

6. Make death familiar to you, by the frequent fore-thoughts of it. Retire often from the world to think of the solemnity of dying, when you are in best health.

7. Be much taken up in the sweet employment of praising God, and exalting the worthy Lamb that was slain; and this will incline you to be there, where this is the continued work.

Lastly. Be often thinking of these warnings and forerunners of death, which God sends to wean your heart from the love of life, and dispose you to a willingness to die. For this end, God sends manifold diseases, pains, infirmities, wants, straits, losses, crosses, disappointments, &c. And in a special manner, let old people view the forerunners and harbingers of death, which God sends to prepare his way: such as the decays and infirmities of old age, which we have elegantly described in figurative expressions, Eccl. xii. 2, "Then the light of the sun, moon, and stars shall be darkened;" i. e., in old persons, the intellectual powers and faculties, which are as lights in the soul, shall be weakened. And then do "the clouds return after rain;" i. e. their distempers are frequent, like a continual dropping in a very rainy day, and the ending of one is but the beginning of another: ver. 3, "Then the keepers of the house do tremble;" i. e., the head and hands, which were employed for the preservation of the body, shake. "The strong men bow themselves;" the legs and thighs, which are the pillars of the house, become weak and feeble. "The grinders cease, because they are few;" i. e., the teeth, which like the upper and nether millstone, grind our meat, and prepare it for concoction, then cease to do their part. "Those that look out of the windows are darkened," i. e., the eyes wax dim, whereby God calls us to turn them away from beholding vanity; and to look after the things that are not seen: ver. 4, "The daughters of music are brought low;" i. e., they have neither voice nor ears; they can neither sing themselves, nor take pleasure in the voice of singing men or singing women. Then death pulls us, as it were, by the ear, to think on the music above; ver. 5, "The almond tree flourisheth;" i. e., the hair grows white, like an almond tree in the blossom. And as the outward parts of the body weaken and decay, so also do the inward parts: therefore it is said, ver. 6, "The silver cord shall be loosed, the golden bowl broken, the pitcher broken at the fountain, and the wheel broken at the cistern;" i. e., the silver cord of the sinews is loosed, which carries the faculty of sense and motion from the head through the body. The head, which, like a golden bowl or box, contains the brain, that is the fountain of sense and motion, through age is broken, and turns crazy. The many pitchers of the veins, which carry the nourishing blood from the well of the liver into each part of the body, become like broken vessels. And the wheel of the arteries, which conveys the vital spirits from the heart to the several members for quickening them, begins to turn faint and languid. All these things warn old persons to take their affections off time's things, and set them on things above, that they may be helped to say, we "desire to depart, and to be with Christ."

But, after all, some believers will have objections against willingness to die, some whereof I shall consider.

Object. 1. "I am threatened to be cut off in the flower of mine age."

Ans. Instead of fretting on this account, you ought rather to adore and praise a gracious God, that is willing to bestow the reward of the whole day upon thee, who hast only laboured some hours of it. Praise him, that is willing to take you soon home; whereby you will prevent much sin and sorrow in the world.

Object. 2. "I have houses and lands, and a comfortable dwelling on the earth."

Ans. These are only needful in your passage through the world; above there is no use for these comforts. There God provideth mansions for his people, a thousand times more comfortable, John xiv. 2; 2 Cor. v. 1. Surely houses of God's building, and of Christ's furnishing, are preferable to the cottages built by men's hands.

Object. 3. "But I am loth to leave God's ordinances, and the sweet communion I have had with him therein."

Ans. Above there will be no need of ordinances, sacraments, bibles, or ministers; for the Lamb will be the light of the heavenly temple, and all hidden things in religion will be discovered in Christ's face. There you will celebrate an eternal Sabbath, drink the fruit of the vine new with Christ, be ever with the Lord, without any cloud or interruption of your communion with him. Is it any loss to be taken from the shallow streams, and set by the fountain that is ever full and running over?

Object. 4. "I am loth to leave the company of godly friends and relations."

Ans. Death will take you to your friend Christ, that is far better than them all. And for one friend you lose upon earth, you shall find an hundred in heaven; and these godly relations you leave here, you shall soon meet with them again there; where you will have far more sweet communion than possibly you can have upon earth with them, or the best of them, who while here have several infirmities and passions, that many times make their converse uncomfortable.

Object. 5. "But I would fain see the glory of Zion upon earth, when God's promises to her shall be accomplished."

Ans. So Moses would fain have seen Israel's happiness in the promised land: but his dying in the firm belief of God's fulfilling all his promises to them there, was more acceptable to God, than his beholding the performance. And the glory of the church militant, is a sight nothing comparable to that of the church triumphant above.

Object. 6. "But I would incline to stay to do God more service in his church below, whose necessities are claimant."

Ans. 1. You will not want opportunity for serving and glorifying God above, and where you will be in a far better case for it. Here, our hearts are often out of tune for God's work, and we are forced to hang our harps upon the willows; but above there are no willows to hang them on; no saint there will ever complain of any indisposition of heart or tongue.

2. God knows the necessities of his church, and is more concerned for them than thou canst be; and it is easy for him to raise up instruments to carry on his work when thou art gone.

Object. 7. "I am afraid of the pain and pangs of death. The thoughts of these make me shrink back."

Ans. 1. Many die without much seeming sense of pain, and it is probable have less pain at the hour of death, than they have felt under several former diseases.

2. If they be sharp, they are soon over; and each pang of death will set sin a step nearer the door, and thy soul a step nearer home: and therefore, it becometh a Christian to die cheerfully, and to be glad when he can find the grave.

Now, what I have said in this chapter is to the believing soul: for it is no wonder though the souls of the ungodly, at death, shrink back into the body, and tremble to go forth, when they can have no prospect of any better lodging than utter darkness.

DIRECT. V.—STUDY TO IMITATE THE ANCIENT WORTHIES, BY DYING IN FAITH.

THIS was the character and epitaph of the Old Testament saints, Heb. xi. 13, "These all died in faith." As they had lived in faith, so they died in faith. They not only continued true believers to the last, dying in the state of faith, but they died in the exercise of faith also. Now, the exercise of faith in dying, includes several things worthy to be imitated by all dying believers.

1. An open and professed adherence to the doctrine of faith, and truths of Christianity. This faith all Christians should zealously own in the view of death, and persevere in it to the last, without wavering. This would be to die like martyrs, though we die in our beds. How steadfastly did old Polycarp adhere to Christ and his truths to the last, and so died in faith! When he was urged by the pro-consul to deny Christ, he answered, "These fourscore and six years have I served him, and he never once offended me: and how shall I now deny him?"

2. Dying in faith imports an inward, hearty, and firm belief of the fundamental articles of the Christian faith; and improving them so, as to make them the foundation of our comfort and hope at the hour of death. As, for instance, we must yield our departing souls, in the firm belief of their living and existing in a separate condition after this life, and of that future state of blessedness and rest which God hath prepared for all believers. Again, we must dismiss the body to the grave, in a firm belief and hope of a joyful resurrection at the last day. Thus that holy man Job both lived and died in faith, Job xix. 25, 26, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth. And though, after my skin, worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God." A Christian then dies in faith, when he believes these truths so as cheerfully to obey God's call, and venture into the invisible world, upon the testimony which God hath given concerning it; as Abraham did in going out to an unknown land, Heb. xi. 8, "By faith Abraham, when he was called to go out into a place which he should after receive for an inheritance, obeyed; and he went out, not knowing whither he went."

3. The believer dies in faith, when he makes fresh application to Christ as his only hope and Saviour, takes him in his arms of faith, as old Simeon did before his death, saying, "In the Lord Jesus Christ I have righteousness and strength;" though I have neither righteousness nor strength in myself, yet I have both in him, my blessed Surety and Redeemer. We have many uses for faith in Christ at the hour of death. By faith we must depend upon Christ's blood for making atonement, and washing away the guilt of all our by-past sins. By faith we must put on the righteousness of Christ, for covering our naked souls, when they are to appear and stand before God. By faith we must rely on Christ for strength to suffer pain, resist temptations, to conquer death and all our enemies. By faith we must look to Christ as our leader, and trust him for our safe conduct through the dark valley of death, and for our safe landing on the shore of glory.

4. The believer dies in faith, when he trusts his departing soul with confidence in his Redeemer's hand, saying with Paul, 2 Tim. i. 12, "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day." This was the Psalmist's practice, Psal. xxxi. 5, "Into thy hand I commit my spirit; for thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of truth." So the man who dies in faith, commits the jewel of his soul to his Redeemer's keeping, and confides in his care of it. Why? He made it, he hath redeemed it, he loves it, it is his own, a member of his body, and he will not hate his own flesh. He loves his dying saints much better than we love an eye, a hand, or any other member of our body, which, to be sure, we will not lose, if it be in our power to save it.

5. Dying in faith imports, that the dying saint confides in God's faithfulness and truth for making good all his promises to his church and people after his death, which are not yet accomplished. We should go off the stage in the firm belief of God's fulfilling all his promises concerning the prosperity of his church, the calling of the Jews, the destruction of Antichrist, and the second coming of our Lord; and likewise concerning our families, that God will be as good as his word, and be a father to the fatherless, and a husband to the widow.

Would we then be so happy as to die in faith, let us take these advices:

1. Let us be careful to get faith before-hand; for death is a time to use faith, not to get it. They were foolish virgins who had their oil to buy when the bridegroom was come.

2. Study to live every day in the exercise of faith, and be still improving and making use of Christ in all his offices, and for all those ends and uses for which God hath given him to believers.

3. Be frequently clearing up your evidences for heaven, and beware of letting sin blot them to you.

4. Record and lay up the experiences of God's kind dealings with you, and be often reflecting upon them, that you may have them ready at hand in the hour of death.

5. Meditate much on those promises which have been sweet and comfortable to you in the time of straits; and beg that the Lord may bring them to your remembrance when you come to die.

DIRECT. VI.—SET THE EXAMPLES OF OTHER DYING SAINTS BEFORE YOU, AND STUDY IN LIKE MANNER TO SHINE IN GRACE, AND BE EXEMPLARY IN PIETY AND HEAVENLY DISCOURSE, FOR THE GLORY OF GOD, AND GOOD OF SOULS, WHEN YOU ARE GOING OFF THE STAGE.

THIS is the last opportunity you have of doing service to God, and the interest of religion; wherefore, strive to improve it diligently for the honour of God, and the edification of those that survive you. How pleasant is it to see God's people leaving the world, commending Christ and his service, and perfuming the place they lie in with their last breath? I have, Chap. III. Direct. V. and VI., adduced several motives to press this point, and given directions concerning the speech and behaviour of the children of God when on sick-beds, which I shall not repeat.

That which I design here is, to set before you the examples of some eminent saints, and their exemplary, pious, and holy speeches and sayings, when they were a-dying; and that, in order to confirm and establish others in religion, and also to excite them to imitate those shining worthies, when they also come to die. Surely it is for this very end that God hath ordered us to be compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, Heb. xii. 1. Thus doth the apostle improve their example, Heb. xi. 1. And how earnest is he in this matter? Heb. vi. 11, 12, "And we desire that every one of you do show the same diligence, to the full assurance of hope unto the end; that ye be not slothful, but followers of them, who, through faith and patience, inherit the promises."

I shall begin with some examples from the sacred history; and, in the first place, with the King of saints, our Lord Jesus Christ. O how sweet and comfortable were his discourses unto his disciples, when his death drew nigh! and, what a heavenly prayer did he make for them and all his elect ones at that time! These we have recorded in the xiv. xv. xvi. and xvii. chapters of John; which are most seasonable at all times for us to read and meditate upon, but especially when death is approaching. And, likewise, let us read the history of our Lord's passion, in which we may observe the wonderful expressions of his faith in God, his patience under sufferings, his pity to his enemies, his love to his mother and his disciples, his concern for his Father's glory, his obedience in his death, and his willingness to be offered up. Thus the blessed Sun of Righteousness did shine forth most gloriously at his setting, with the radiant beams of his heavenly graces and virtues: and herein he hath set himself a pattern to all dying saints to the end of the world.

Jacob, when he was on his death-bed, called his sons together, and gave them many special charges and blessings; we have his excellent words recorded in Gen. xlviii. and xlix. chapters. And, in particular, how sweetly doth he speak of the coming of the Messiah to them? Gen. xlix. 10, 18; and how affectionately doth he commend God's goodness and kind providence towards him through his life? Gen. xlviii. 15, 16, "The God which fed me all my life long unto this day," &c.

Joseph, when he was a-dying, spoke lovingly to his brethren, who had dealt cruelly with him; and assured them of the Lord's faithfulness in keeping his promise to their fathers, Gen. l. 20, "I die, and God will surely visit you, and bring you out of this land."

Moses, when he was to go up to mount Nebo, to die there, left many blessings, and gave many weighty charges to the children of Israel; we have his holy and ravishing words recorded, Deut. xxxii. and xxxiii. And, particularly, how pleasantly doth he commend God and his ways to the people! Deut. xxxii. 4, "He is the Rock, his work is perfect; for all his ways are judgment; a God of truth, and without iniquity; just and right is he."

Joshua, when he was near his end, gave many solemn charges and exhortations to the people, which we have narrated, Josh. xxiii. and xxiv. And there we may see the remarkable methods he takes to rivet impressions and convictions upon them, now when he can instruct them no longer. And particularly he appeals to their consciences concerning the faithfulness of God in keeping his word to them, that so he might engage them to fidelity to him, Josh. xxiii. 14, "And behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth, and you know in all your hearts and in all your souls, that not one thing hath failed of all the good things which the Lord your God spake concerning you."

David, when his end was near, assembled the people, and solemnly charged them as in the audience of God, to keep his commandments, 1 Chron. xxviii. 8, 9. And particularly he charged his son and successor Solomon, to "know the God of his father, and to serve him with a perfect heart, and with a willing mind."

The apostle Paul, when taking his last farewell of the elders of Ephesus, most solemnly charges them to "take heed to themselves, and the flocks over which the Holy Ghost had made them overseers," Acts xx. 28. And how sweetly doth he sing in the view of approaching death, 2 Tim. iv. 6—8, "I am now ready to be offered, the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto them also that love his appearing."

In imitation of those scripture saints, the people of God, in all ages, have studied to glorify God and edify men at their death, by commending God and godliness to their friends and families. Those we ought to teach by our example, both how to live and how to die, as others have done before us. Thus, said once a dying saint to his family, "I have formerly taught you how to live, and now I teach you how to die."

Now, because in all ages the speeches of dying Christians have been much observed, that God hath remarkably blessed them to the establishment and confirmation, quickening and exciting, of others to imitate them; I shall bring several examples from human histories and writings, and mostly from Clark's Lives, of sundry eminent saints, whose graces have shone brightest, and their speeches were most heavenly, when the sun of their life was at the setting.

1. That old disciple, Polycarp, when he came to the stake at which he was burnt, desired to stand untied, saying, "Let me alone; for he that gave me strength to come to the fire, will give me patience to endure the flame without your tying."

2. So holy Cyprian triumphed over death, saying, "Let him only fear death, who must pass from this death to the second death. When he heard the sentence of death pronounced against him, he said, "I thank God for freeing me from the prison of this body."

3. Basil, when the emperor Valens sent his officers to tempt him with great preferments to turn from the faith, he rejected them with scorn, saying, "You may offer these things to children." And when they threatened him with sufferings, he said, "Threaten your purple gallants with these things, that give themselves to their pleasures."

When Modestus the prefect threatened Basil to confiscate his goods, to torment him, to banish him, or kill him, he answered, "He need not fear confiscation that hath nothing to lose; nor banishment, to whom heaven only is a country; nor torments, when his body would be dashed with one blow; nor death, which is the only way to set him at liberty. The prefect telling him he was mad, he said, Opto me in æternum sic delirare, "I wish I may for ever be thus mad."

4. Ignatius being led from Syria to Rome to be torn in pieces of wild beasts, he expressed his fear lest it should happen to him as to some others, that the lions, out of a kind of reverence, would not dare to touch him. And therefore he often wished, "That their appetites might be whetted to dispatch him. For, says he, the lions' teeth are but like a mill, which, though it bruisheth, yet wasteth not the good wheat, only prepares and fits it to be made pure bread. Let me be broken by them, so I may be made pure manent for heaven."

5. The great Mr. Knox, our Reformer, when he lay a-dying, was much in prayer, ever crying, "Come, Lord Jesus; sweet Jesus, into thy hands I commend my spirit." Being asked, by those that attended him, if his pain was great; he answered, that "He did not esteem that a pain, which would be to him the end of all trouble, and the beginning of eternal joys." Ofttimes, after some deep meditations, he said, "O serve the Lord in fear, and death shall not be terrible to you: blessed is the death of those that have part in the death of Jesus."

After a sore temptation from Satan (which I formerly mentioned) over which he triumphed at length, he said, "Now the enemy is gone away ashamed, and shall no more return. I am sure now my battle is at an end, and that without pain of body, or trouble of spirit, I shall shortly change this mortal and miserable life, with that happy and immortal life, which shall never have an end." After one had prayed for him, he was asked whether he heard the prayer? He answered, "Would to God you had heard it with such an ear and heart as I have done!" Adding, "Lord Jesus receive my spirit." With which words, without any motion of hands or feet, as one falling asleep, rather than dying, he ended his life.

6. Dr. Gouge, when he was old and dying, was sore afflicted with the stone, and other painful maladies; yet though, by reason of his pains, he was often heard to groan, he never once grumbled against the dispensations of God: he never cried out, A great sufferer, but often, A great sinner: yet still comforted himself, that there is a great Saviour. In his greatest torments he would say, "Well, yet in all these there is nothing of hell, or of God's wrath. O my soul, be silent, be patient. It is thy God and Father that thus orders thine estate. Thou art his clay, he may tread and trample upon thee as he pleaseth, thou hast deserved much more. It is enough that thou art kept out of hell, though thy pains be grievous, yet they are not intolerable, thy God affords some intermissions; he will turn it to thy good, and at length put an end to all; and none of these comforts can be expected in hell." In his greatest pains, he often used holy Job's words, "Shall we receive good from the hands of the Lord, and not evil also?" When any of his friends would have comforted him, with telling him of his eminent gifts and service in the ministry, he would answer, "I dare not think of any such thing for comfort. Only Jesus Christ, and what he hath done and endured, is the ground of my sure comfort." The thoughts of death were pleasant to him, which he often termed his best friend, next unto Jesus Christ. And he would bless God, that he had nothing to do but to die.

7. I have read of another minister under the like extreme pains. When he was asked how he did? his frequent answer was: "The bush always burning but not consumed; though my pains are above the strength of nature, yet they are not above the support of grace. He would pray, Lord, drop comfort into these bitter waters of Marah. Let the blood of sprinkling, which extinguisheth the fire of thine anger, allay my burning pain. Oh, if my patience were more, my pain would be less; Lord, give me patience, and inflict what thou wilt. This is a fiery chariot, but it will carry me to heaven. O my God, break open the prison-door, and set my poor captive soul free: I desire to be dissolved, but enable me willingly to wait thy time." He would cry again, "When shall the time come, that I shall neither sin more nor sorrow more? Lord, keep me from dishonouring thy name by impatience. O, who would not, even in burnings, have honourable thoughts of God? Lord, thou givest me no occasion to have hard thoughts of thee. Blessed be God for the peace of mine inward man, when my outward man is so full of trouble. This is a bitter cup, but it is of my Father's mixing; and shall I not then drink it?"

8. Mrs. Jane Askew, who was a martyr in king Henry's reign, to her confession in Newgate she thus subscribed: "Written by me, Jane Askew, that neither wisheth death, nor feareth its might, and as merry as one bound towards heaven." When the chancellor sent her letters at the stake, offering her the king's pardon, if she would recant; she, refusing to look upon them, gave this answer; "that she came not thither to deny her Lord and Master."

9. Mr. James Bainham, when he was at the stake, in the midst of the burning fire which had half consumed his legs and arms, spake these words: "O ye papists! behold ye look for miracles, and here now ye may see a miracle; for in this fire I feel no more pain than if I were on a bed of down; it is to me as a bed of roses."

10. John Lambert, as he was burning in Smithfield, and his legs were quite consumed with the fire, he lifted up his hands, his fingers flaming like torches, but his heart abounding with comfort, crying out, "None but Christ, none but Christ."

11. Mr. Robert Glover, a little before his death, had lost the sense of God's favour, for which he was in great heaviness and sorrow; but when he came within sight of the stake at which he was to suffer, he was on a sudden so filled with divine comfort, that clapping his hands together, he cried out to his servant, "He is come, he is come;" and so died most cheerfully.

12. It was a saying of Augustine, "Boughs fall off trees, and stones out of buildings; and why should it seem strange that mortal men die?"

13. Mr. John Dodd had so violent a fever, that there was but little hope of his life; yet at length his physician coming to him, said, "Now I have hope of your recovery." To whom Mr. Dodd answered, "You think to comfort me with this, but you make my heart sad. It is as if you should tell one, who had been so weather-beaten at sea, and conceiving he was now arrived at the haven where his soul longed to be, that he must go back again to be tossed with new winds and waves."

He would often say in his last sickness, "I am not afraid to look death in the face. I can say, Death, where is thy sting? death cannot hurt me."

He used to say, "The knowledge of two things would make one willing to die, viz. What heaven is, and that it is mine." "Yes," said one, "if a man were sure of that." To whom he answered, "Truly assurance is to be had; and what have we been doing all this while?"

Some others of the sayings of this holy man were so pithy and remarkable, I cannot pass them here.

Once Mr. Dodd coming to visit a godly minister on his death-bed, who was much oppressed with melancholy, and complained to him, saying, "O Mr. Dodd, what will you say of him, who is going out of the world, and can find no comfort?" To whom Mr. Dodd answered, "What will you say of our Saviour Christ, who, when he was going out of the world, found no comfort, but cried out, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?' He said of afflictions, they are God's portions, which we may sweeten by faith and faithful prayer; but we, for the most part, make them bitter, putting into God's cup the evil ingredients of our impatience and unbelief. He called death the friend of grace, though it be the enemy of nature; for, whereas the word, sacraments, and prayer but weaken sin, death kills it." He used to say, "A man is never in a hard condition unless he has a hard heart, and cannot pray." He instructed Christians how they should never have a great nor lasting affliction, and that was, by looking upon the things that are not seen, which are eternal, 2 Cor. iv. 17, 18. For what can be great to him that counts the world nothing? And what can be long to him, that counts his life but a span long? When he saw a Christian look sad, he would say, as Jonadab did to Amnon, "Art thou a king's son, and lookest so ill?" And when such complained to him of their crosses and losses, he would use the words of Eliphaz to Job, "Do the consolations of God seem small to you? God hath taken from you your children, your goods, &c. but he hath not taken from you himself, his Christ, nor his Spirit, nor heaven, nor eternal life."

To a friend of his, that rose from a mean to a great estate, he sent word, "That this was but as if he should go out of a boat into a barge or ship; but he ought seriously to remember, that, whilst he was in this world, he was but upon the floating sea."

He often said, that if it were lawful to envy any, he would envy those that turn to God in their youth, whereby they escape much sin and sorrow, and are like Jacob, that stole the blessing betimes. He used to compare reproofs given in passion, to scalding potions, which the patient could not take down; in reproofs we should labour for meekness and wisdom, using soft words and hard arguments.

He was a most popular minister, but much persecuted. Once he took a journey to see his father-in-law, Mr. Greenham, and to bemoan himself to him, upon account of his crosses and hard usage. Mr. Greenham, having heard all he could say, answered him thus: "Son, son, when affliction lieth heavy, sin lieth light." Mr. Dodd used often to bless God for this speech, saying, if Mr. Greenham had bemoaned him as he expected, he had done him much hurt. He forgot not this saying in his old age, but made excellent use of it for himself and others.

14. Ceolampadius, that famous divine of Switzerland, when lying on his death-bed, and being asked, Whether the light did not offend him? He answered, pointing to his breast, "Hic sat lucis, Here is abundance of light," meaning of comfort and joy. He asked one of his friends, What news? His friend answered, None. "Then," saith he, "I will tell you some news; I shall presently be with my Lord Christ."

15. A certain godly man passing through his last sickness with extraordinary calmness of conscience, being asked by some of his friends about it, he answered, that he had stedfastly fixed his heart upon the sweet promise, Isa. xxvi. 3, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee; because he trusteth in thee." And my God, saith he, hath graciously made it fully good unto my soul.

16. Mr. Robert Bolton, minister at Broughton, well known by his writings, in time of his last sickness, which was long and sharp, often breathed out these words: "Oh, when will this good hour come? When shall I be dissolved? When shall I be with Christ?" Being told, that to be dissolved was indeed better for him, yet it would be better for the church that he would stay here; he answered, "If I have found favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me again, and show me both it and his habitation; but, if otherwise, lo, here I am, let him do what seemeth good in his eyes." Being asked by another if he would not be content to live, if it pleased God? He answered, I grant that life is a great blessing of God; neither will I neglect any means that may preserve it; and do heartily submit to God's will; but of the two, I infinitely desire more to be dissolved, and to be with Christ." He bade all that came to see him make sure of Christ before they came to die, and look upon the world now as a lump of vanity. He encouraged the ministers that came to him to be diligent and courageous in the work of the Lord, and not to faint nor droop for any affliction that should arise thereupon.

When he found himself very weak, he called for his wife and children. He desired her to bear his dissolution, which was now at hand, with a Christian fortitude; a thing he had been preparing her for by the space of twenty years; and bade her make no doubt but she should meet him again in heaven. He exhorted his children to remember those things he had frequently told them before; adding, "That he hoped and believed, that none of them durst think to meet him at the great tribunal in an unregenerate state."

Some of his parish coming to watch with him,

it was moved, that as by his doctrine he had discovered to them the exceeding comforts that were in Christ, so he would now tell them what he felt in his own soul. Alas! said he, do you look for that of me now, that wants breath and strength to speak? I have told you enough in my ministry; but yet, to satisfy you, I am, by the wonderful mercies of God, as full of comfort as my heart can hold; and I feel nothing in my soul but Christ, with whom I heartily desire to be." And observing some to be weeping, he looked to them, and said, "Oh, what a deal ado there is before one can die."

When the pangs of death were upon him, being told that some of his dear friends were about him to take their last farewell, he caused himself to be raised up in his bed: and after a few gaspings for breath, he said, "I am now drawing on a pace to my dissolution; hold out faith and patience, your work will speedily be at an end." And then, shaking them all by the hands, he prayed heartily and particularly for them; and desired them to make sure of heaven, and to bear in mind what he had formerly told them in his ministry; protesting that the doctrine he had preached to them for the space of twenty years was the truth of God, as he should answer for it at the tribunal of Christ, before whom he should shortly appear.

When he was struggling with death, a very dear friend taking him by the hand, asked him if he felt not much pain: "Truly no," said he, "the greatest I feel is your cold hand."

17. Mr. John Holland, a godly minister, continued his usual practice of expounding the scriptures in his family to the last; and the day before his death, he called for the bible, and causing another to read the eighth chapter of the Romans, he discoursed upon it verse by verse; but on a sudden, he said, "O stay your reading; what a brightness is this I see? have you lighted up any candles?" A stander by said, No, it is the sun-shine, for it was about five o'clock in a clear summer's evening. "Sun-shine?" said he, "nay, it is my Saviour's shine. Now, farewell world; welcome heaven; the day-star from on high hath visited my heart: O speak it when I am gone, and preach it at my funeral; God dealeth familiarly with man, I feel his mercy, I see his majesty; whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell, God he knoweth; but I see things that are unutterable." And in this rapture he continued till he died.

18. I knew, not long ago, an eminent godly man, G. M., that fell into several such extraordinary raptures some time before his death, such as his bodily strength and spirit were not able to support under, though he had no sickness. Sometimes he was so swallowed up and overcome by the manifestations of God's love to his soul, that his words could not be well understood; his natural colour, heat, and strength, would so go off, that all about him would conclude him to be dying: but, when he was able to get words uttered, they were so heavenly and ravishing concerning the love of Christ, and freedom of grace, that by-standers could not hear him without weeping. Sometimes ministers, when they came to visit him, and found him in these raptures, were forced to turn all their prayers in his behalf into praises, except some petitions they would put up to God, "that he might graciously spare and be tender of his weak body, and enable him to bear that load of loving-kindness God was pleased to let out to him, and which his present bodily strength was not sufficient for." Yea, they would be put to cry, "Lord, if it be thy will, hold thy hand, for he is but a clay vessel; this new wine will burst the old bottle; preserve him in life as a monument of the rich grace of God, for the conviction of atheists and carnal people, and for the confirmation of the faith of the children of God." Sometimes he would cry, in abrupt expressions, "O angels, help me to praise him! O saints, admire his love, and wonder at him. Again, O flames of love! My soul seeth Christ! The heavens open! I see a throne, and the Lamb in the midst of the throne! O what think ye of Christ? My soul breathes,—breathes towards him! My spirit is exhaled out of me by the manifestations of God." He used frequently to say, with a heavenly air, to his friends, "O what think ye of Christ?" When his extasy did somewhat abate, so that he attained a pleasant calmness of thought, and freedom of speech, he would discourse of the mysteries of religion, the electing love of God, the freedom of grace, the unsearchable riches of Christ, and the glorious contrivance of redemption through his death and sacrifice! I say, he would talk of these things more like an angel than a man. For such was his heavenly eloquence, fluency of words, and facility of speaking upon these subjects, which otherwise was not natural to him, that those who came to see him were exceedingly surprised and astonished to hear him. His body gradually weakened under these raptures of spirit, and he longed much to be off the world, because he could be so little useful in it for advancing God's honour. He reckoned himself bound to improve the short time he was like to have here, in commending Christ and religion to all that he had access to, and also to admonish them of any thing he knew amiss in them, which he did most convincingly. And having occasion to see some who disliked the established church, and the ordinances dispensed in it; he highly commended the ordinances, and told them, that from his own sweet experience he could say, that God was to be found in them. He seemed to have sin wonderfully mortified; for he complained of no other heart-plague but self, and it was his great exercise to get self wholly subdued; he pursued it through many of its windings and lurking places, and, after all, he would regret his little success against it.

"For," said he, "when I am in my most elevated frames, and admitted to the nearest access to my Redeemer, that subtle enemy, self, will enter in with me, and offer to pull the crown off his head before my face."

Once after hearing a sermon on Psal. lxxxv. 8, "I will hear what God the Lord will speak," he broke out in a rapturous discourse to one that came to see him, blessing God that he had spoke to him in that sermon. "O," said he, "what am I, that the Rock of Israel should have spoke to me these three sermon-days bygone, assuring me that all my sins are forgiven? What am I, a vile worm, that he should be so kind and condescending, as to discover Christ and heaven in such a manner to me, and assure me that I will shortly be with him? O I thought that I had sinned him away from me, but I see he will not bide away! O admirable free grace! O help me to praise him!"

When death drew near there was some alteration in his case; yet he never questioned his interest in Christ; but still asserted, "I know he is my God and Redeemer, and I shall be shortly with him." And once, when he was ready to complain for want of God's wonted manifestations, he said, the Lord knew his body was now weak, and could not bear what formerly he had met with, yet, said he, glory to his name, he hath given me three blinks since my last illness began.

19. Dr. Harris, head of Trinity college in Oxford, in his last sickness used to exhort all about him to get faith above all things. "It is," he said, "your victory, your peace, your life, your crown, and your chiefest piece of spiritual armour. Howbeit, get on all other pieces, and go forth in the Lord's might: stand to the fight, and thy issue shall be glorious. Only forget not to call in the help of your general: do all for him and under him." On the Lord's day he would not have any kept from the ordinances on his account; and when they returned from the sermons, he would say to them, "Come, what have you for me?" And when any gave him an account of what they had heard, he would resume the heads thereof, and say, "O what excellent truths are these! Lay them up carefully, for you will have need of them." When friends came to visit him, he would say, "I cannot speak, but I can hear." Being asked where his comfort lay? he answered, "In Christ, and in the free grace of God."

One telling him that he might take much comfort in his labours, and the good he had done; his answer was, "All is nothing without a Saviour; without him my best works would condemn me. O, I am ashamed of them, they are so mixed with sin. I have done nothing for God as I ought,—Oh, loss of time sits very heavy upon my spirits. Work, work apace; assure yourselves nothing will more trouble you when you come to die, than that you have done no more for God, who hath done so much for you."

Sometimes he used thus to breathe out himself: "I never in all my life saw the worth of a Christ, nor tasted the sweetness of God's love in that measure, as now I do."—Being asked by ministers, what they should chiefly request for him? He answered, Do not only pray for me, but praise God that he supports me, and keeps off Satan from me in my weakness; beg that I may hold out. I am now a great way home, near the shore, I leave you tossing on the sea; O, it is a good time to die in.

In all his latter-wills which he made, he took care this legacy should still be inserted; "Item, I bequeath to all my children and to their children's children, to each of them a bible, with this inscription, None but Christ." He used to say, "it is a hard thing for a saint to forgive himself some faults, when God hath forgiven them."

20. David Chitreaus, when he lay a-dying, lifted up his head from the pillow to hear the discourses of his friends that sat by him, and said, "that he should die with the greatest comfort, if he might die learning something."

21. Mr. Cooper, when a-dying, said, "I saw not my children when they were in the womb, yet there the Lord fed them without my care or knowledge. I shall not see them when I go out of the body, yet shall they not want a father. Again, death is somewhat dreary, and the streams of that Jordan between us and our Canaan run furiously, but they stand still when the Ark comes."

22. The Rev. Mr. Halyburton, that shining light in St. Andrews, when a-dying, commended Christ and godliness with great earnestness to all that came to see him. He exhorted his brethren to diligence in the ministry. "It was the delight of my heart," said he, "to preach the gospel: I desire to decrease that the bridegroom might increase, and to be nothing that he might be all. I repent I did not more for him. O that I had the tongues of men and angels, to praise him." When he was advised to lie quiet, he said, "Whereupon should a man bestow his last breath, but in commending the Lord Jesus Christ, God clothed in our nature, dying for our sins?"

He caused them read one of Mr. Rutherford's letters; viz., that to Mr. John Main, and thereafter said, "That is a book I would recommend to you all, there is more practical religion in that letter, than in a book of a larger volume."

He exhorted some ministers, that came to see him, to faithfulness. "As for the work of the ministry, said he, it was my deliberate choice: were my days lengthened out much longer, and days as troublesome as they are like to be, I would rather be a condemned minister of God, than the greatest prince on earth." He said, when taking farewell of his wife, children, and servants, "Here is a demonstration of the reality of religion, that I, a poor, weak, timorous man, as much afraid of death as any, am now enabled, by the power of grace, composedly, and with joy, to look death in the face. I dare look it in the face in its most ghastly shape, and hope within a little to have the victory. I cannot but commend the Lord Jesus. As far as my words will go, I must proclaim it, He is the best master that ever I saw." To his son, who was a child, he said, "If I had as many sons as there are hairs on your head, I would bestow them all on God." To some present he said, "O sirs, I dread mightily that a rational sort of religion is coming in among us; I mean by it, a religion that consists in a bare attendance on outward duties and ordinances, without the power of godliness; and thence people shall fall into a way of serving God, which is mere Deism, having no relation to Christ Jesus and the Spirit of God."—He expressed his fears of a storm coming on the church of Scotland; but he said, The day will break, and the Lord would arise, and he hoped the church would be made a wonder, and the Lord will say, "Lo, this people have I formed for myself; he can make a nation to be born at once." He cried often with the spouse in the Song: "When shall the day break, and the shadows fly away? Turn, my beloved, and be thou as a roe or a young hart on the mountains of Bethel."

He said, "Shall I forget Zion? Nay, let my right hand forget her cunning, if I prefer not Jerusalem to my chiefest joy. O to have God returning to this church, and his work going on in this world! if every drop of my blood, every bit of my body, every hair of my head, were all men; they should all go to the fire to have this going on."—He said, "If I should say that I would speak no more in the name of the Lord, it would be like a fire within me. I am calling, you to see a miracle; God is melting me down into corruption and dust, and yet he is keeping me in a calm.—I could not believe that I would have borne, and borne cheerfully, this rod so long; this is a miracle, pain without pain; and this is not a fancy of a man disordered in his brain, but of one lying in full composure. O blessed be God, that ever I was born. I have a father and a mother, and ten brethren and sisters in heaven, and I shall be the eleventh. I shall shortly be at that glory I have been long expecting: though I come not near Mr. Shield's glory, nor Mr. Anderson's, yet I will be well enough if I get in. Worthy is the Lamb to receive glory."

23. Mr. Hugh Mackaill, in his speech before his death, said, "I have esteemed the solemn engagements of this nation to the Lord's pregnant performances of that promise, Isa. xlv. 5, where it is evident, that where church reformatations come to any maturity, they arrive at this degree of saying, I am the Lord's, and subscribing with the hand unto the Lord. So was it in the days of the reforming kings of Judah, and after the restoration from the captivity of Babylon, in the days of Nehemiah. This same purpose did the Lord Jesus make yea and Amen to us, when he redeemed us from spiritual Babylon.—I glorify him that he hath called me forth to suffer for his name and ordinances, and the solemn engagements of the land to him. Hereafter I will not walk with flesh and blood, nor think on the world's consolations. Farewell all my friends whose company hath been refreshful to me in my pilgrimage. I have done with the light of the sun and moon. Welcome, eternal life, everlasting love, everlasting praise, everlasting glory. Praise to him that sits upon the throne, and to the Lamb for ever."

24. The famous Mr. Durham being visited by a minister in his last sickness, which was long and lingering, who said to him, Sir, I hope you have set all in order, and that you have nothing else to do but die. "I bless God (said Mr. Durham) I have not had that to do neither these many years."

25. Mr. Rowland Nevat's dying prayer for his children was, that the Mediator's blessing might be the portion of every one of them. Adding to them, I charge you all, see to it, that you meet me on the right hand of Christ at the great day. When he was sometimes much spent with his labours, he would appeal to God, that, though he might be wearied in his service, he would never be weary of it. Being often distempered in his body, he would say, he was never better than in the pulpit, and that it was the best place he could wish to die in.

26. Mr. Philip Henry, when a-dying, his pains were very sharp; he said to his neighbours who came in to see him, O make sure work for your souls, by getting an interest in Christ, while you are in health; for if I had that work to do now, what would become of me. A little before his last illness he wrote to a reverend brother, "Me-thinks it is strange, that it should be your lot and mine to abide so long on earth by the stuff, when so many of our friends are dividing the spoil above; but God will have it so, and to be willing to live in obedience to his holy will, is as true an act of grace as to be willing to die when he calls." One asking him how he did, he answered, "I find the chips fly off apace, the tree will be down shortly." He was sometimes taken with fainting fits, which, when he recovered from, he would say, "Dying is but a little more." Once he said, after a little recovery, "Well, I thought I had been putting into the harbour, but I find I must go to sea again."

27. Mr. Matthew Henry's death was somewhat sudden: he said a little before it to some about him, "You have been used to take notice of the sayings of dying men; this is mine, that a life spent in the service of God and communion with him, is the most comfortable and pleasant life that any one can live in this world."

28. Holy and learned Mr. Rutherford, a little before his death, left a written testimony to our covenanted work of reformation; and therein he proves the warrantableness of nations entering into covenant with God under the New Testament times, and shows that this practice is the accomplishment of several Old Testament prophecies, such as Jer. l. 4, 5; Isa. ii. 3; xix. 23—25; Zech. viii. 2; which relate to gospel times. And when he was a-dying, he sent several messages to the presbytery of St. Andrew's, desiring them to adhere to God's cause and covenant. In sickness he often broke out in sacred raptures, extolling and commending the Lord Jesus, whom he often called his blessed Master, his kingly King. When his death drew near, he said, "I shall shine, I shall see him as he is, I shall see him reign, and all his fair company with him, and I shall have my large share: my eyes shall see my Redeemer, those very eyes of mine, and no other for me." When exhorting one to be diligent in seeking God, he said, "It is no easy thing to be a Christian; but for me, I have gotten the victory, and Christ is holding out both his arms to embrace me." He was wonderfully strengthened against the fears of suffering and of death; for, says he, "I said to the Lord, if he would slay me five thousand times, I would trust in him, and I spoke it with much trembling, fearing I should not make my boast good. But as really as ever he spoke to me by his Spirit, he witnessed unto my heart, that his grace should be sufficient for me." He said to some ministers that came to see him, "My Lord and Master is the chief of ten thousand of thousands! none is comparable to him in heaven or on earth. Dear brethren, do all for him, pray for Christ, preach for Christ, feed the flock committed to your charge for Christ, visit and catechise for Christ; do all for Christ, and beware of man-pleasing. Feed the flock out of love, the chief Shepherd will appear shortly."

Once when he recovered from a fainting fit, he said, "I feel, I feel, I believe, I enjoy, I rejoice, I feed on manna." As he took a little wine in a spoon, Mr. Robert Blair said to him, You feed on the dainties of heaven, and think nothing of our cordials on earth. He said, "They are all but dung, yet they are Christ's creatures, and, in obedience to his command, I take them." After some discourse, Mr. Blair said to him, What think you now of Christ? To which he replied, "I shall live and adore him: glory, glory, to my Creator, and to my Redeemer for ever. Glory shines in Emmanuel's land." Afterwards he said, "O that all my brethren did know what a Master I have served, and what peace I have this day! I shall sleep in Christ, and when I awake, I shall be satisfied with his likeness." Then he said, "This night shall close the door, and put my anchor within the veil, I shall go away in a sleep by five o'clock in the morning;" which exactly fell out. That night, though he was very weak, he often had this expression, O for arms to embrace him! O for a well-tuned harp!

When some spoke to him of his former painfulness and faithfulness in the work of God, he said, "I disclaim all that; the port I would be in at, is redemption and forgiveness of sins through his blood." His last words were, "Glory, glory dwelleth in Emmanuel's land."

29. Hugh Kennedy, provost of Ayr, when he was a-dying, a minister said to him, You have cause, Sir, to be assured, that the angels of God are now waiting at the stoops of this bed to convey your soul to Abraham's bosom; to whom his answer was, "I am sure thereof; and if the walls of this house could speak, they could tell how many sweet days I have had in fellowship with God, and how familiar he hath been with my soul." He was one of the greatest wrestlers with God that was in the age wherein he lived, and he had most remarkable returns of prayer. The great Mr. Welsh, in a letter from France, said of him, "Happy is that city, yea, happy is that nation, that hath a Hugh Kennedy in it; I have myself certainly found the answer of his prayers from the Lord in my behalf."

30. The great Mr. Robert Bruce, minister of Edinburgh, when dying through weakness and old age, being asked by one of his friends, how matters stood now between God and his own soul? answered, "When I was young I was diligent, and lived by faith in the Son of God, but now I am old, and not able to do so much, yet he condescends to feed me with lumps of sense." That morning before he died, he came to breakfast at his table, and having eat, as he used, one single egg, he said to his daughter, I think I am yet hungry, you may bring me another. But presently he fell into a deep meditation; and having mused a while, he said, "Hold, daughter, hold, my Master calls me." With these words his sight failed him, whereupon he called for the Bible; but finding his sight gone, he said, "Cast me up the eighth chapter of the epistle to the Romans, and set my finger on these words, 'I am persuaded that neither death nor life, angels, &c., shall be able to separate me from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus my Lord.'" Now, said he, is my finger upon them? they told him it was. Then, without any more, he said, "Now God be with you, my children, I have breakfasted with you, and shall sup with my Lord Jesus Christ this night." And so gave up the ghost.

31. John Stewart, provost of Ayr, was a singularly pious man, yet when he lay a-dying, he said to some about him, "I go the way of all flesh, and it may be some of you doubt nothing of my well being; yea, I testify, that except when I slept, or was on business, I was not these ten years without thoughts of God, so long as I would be in going from my own house to the cross; and yet I doubt myself, and am in great agony, yea, at the brink of despair." But a day or two before he died, he turned his face to the wall from the company for two hours. Then Mr. Ferguson the minister coming in, asked what he was doing? upon which he turned himself, with these words: "I have been fighting and working out my salvation with fear and trembling; and now I bless God, it is perfected, sealed, confirmed, and all fears are gone."

32. Luther, when he fell sick, made his will, in which he bequeathed his detestation of Popery to his friends, and to the pastors of the church, having before made this verse:

Pestis eram vicus, moriens ero mors tua, Papa.

In his last will, he said, "O Lord God, I thank thee that thou wouldst have me live a poor and indigent person upon the earth. I have neither houses nor lands, nor possessions, nor money to leave. Thou, Lord, hast given me a wife and children; them, Lord, I give back to thee. Nourish, instruct, and keep them. O thou, the Father of orphans, and judge of the widow, as thou hast done to me, so do to them."

In his last prayer, February 18th, 1546, he hath these words, "I pray God to preserve his gospel among us; for the pope and council of Trent have grievous things in hand. O heavenly Father, I give thee thanks that thou hast revealed to me thy Son Jesus Christ, whom I believe, whom I profess, whom I glorify, and whom the pope and the rout of the wicked persecute and dishonour." Mr. Fox said of Luther, "That a poor friar should be able to stand against the pope, was a great miracle; that he should prevail against the pope, was greater; and, after all, to die in peace, having so many enemies, was the greatest of all."

33. Mr. Joseph Allen, a most painful and laborious minister, being deprived of the use of his arms and legs before his death, was asked by a friend, how he could be so well contented to lie so long in that condition? He answered, "What! is God my Father, Jesus Christ my Saviour, and the Holy Spirit my Sanctifier and Comforter; and shall I not be content without limbs and health? He is an unreasonable wretch that cannot be content with a God, though he had nothing else."

When his people of Taunton came to Dorchester to see him, where he lay, he was much revived, and would sit up in his bed, have the curtains drawn by, and desired them to stand round about the bed; and caused take out his hand and hold it out to them, that they might take it as he used formerly to do, when he had been absent from them. And though very weak, yet he spoke to them thus: "O how it rejoiceth my heart to see your faces, and to hear your voices, though I cannot speak as heretofore unto you. Methinks I am now like old Jacob, with all his sons about him. Now, you see my weak estate, thus I have been for many weeks since I parted with you, but God hath been with me. My friends, life is mine, death is mine; in that covenant of which I preached to you, is all my salvation, and all my desire; although my body do not prosper, I hope through grace my soul doth. I have lived a sweet life by the promises, and I hope through grace can die by a promise. It is the promises of God that will stand by us. Nothing but God in them will stand us in a day of affliction. My dear friends, I feel the power of those doctrines I preached to you on my heart, the doctrines of faith, of repentance, of self-denial, of the covenant of grace, of contentment, &c. O that you would live them over, now I cannot preach them to you. It is a shame for a believer to be cast down under afflictions, that hath so many glorious privileges, justification, adoption, sanctification, and eternal glory. We shall be as the angels of God in a little while; nay, to say the truth, believers are, as it were, little angels already, that live in the power of faith. O my friends, live like believers, trample this dirty world under your feet: be not taken with its comforts, nor disquieted with its crosses, you will be gone out of it shortly."

When they came to take leave of him, he would needs pray with them as his weak state did suffer him. Then he said, "Farewell, my dear friends; go home and live over what I have preached to you, and the Lord provide for you when I am gone. Now I cannot preach to you, but let my wasted strength and useless limbs be a sermon to you. I am afraid of some of you, after all I have spoken to you. There are many professors who can pray well and talk well, whom we shall find at the left hand of Christ another day. You have your trades, your estates, your relations, be not taken with these, but with God; O live on him. For the Lord's sake, go home, and take heed of the world, worldly cares, worldly comforts, worldly relations, &c. Oh! let not my labours and sufferings, let not my wasted strength, and useless limbs, rise up in judgment against you at the great day of the Lord." Then he said, "The Lord having given authority to his ministers to bless his people, accordingly I bless you in his name (using the words he always used after a sacrament). The Lord bless you and keep you, the Lord cause his face to shine upon you, and give you peace. And the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant; make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory for ever, and ever. Amen."

In the mornings, his first speeches would be (which he also used in his health), "Now we have one day more, this is one more for God, now let us live well this day, work hard for our souls; lay up much treasure in heaven this day, for we have but a few to live."

Being taken to the bath, where he met with extraordinary kindness from strangers, for many resorted to him, to see him and hear him speak, having heard what a monument of mercy he was, he delighted himself much in the consideration of the Lord's kindness to him, and the tokens of strangers' love, and would often say, "I was a stranger, and mercy took me in: in prison, and it came to me; sick and weak, and it visited me."

N. B. He had been much persecuted, and put in prison, for no other crime but preaching the gospel.

He had a most pious and affectionate wife that waited closely upon him, to whom he said, "Now, my dear heart, my companion in all my tribulations and afflictions, I thank thee for all thy pains and labours for me at home and abroad, in prison and liberty, in health and sickness." And he prayed that the Lord would requite her, fill her with all manner of grace and consolation, and support and carry her through all difficulties.

He had some conflicts with Satan a little before death; once he uttered these words, "Away, thou foul fiend, thou enemy of all mankind, thou subtle sophister, art thou come now to molest me? Now I am just going! Now I am so weak, and death upon me! Trouble me not, for I am none of thine, I am the Lord's; Christ is mine, and I am his, his by covenant; I have sworn myself to be the Lord's, and his I will be; therefore be gone." These last words he repeated often, as pleading his covenanting with God, as a mean to resist the devil and his temptations. When he looked on his weak consumed hands, he would say, "These shall be changed; this vile body shall be made like to Christ's glorious body. O what a glorious day will the day of the resurrection be? Methinks I see it by faith; how will the saints lift up their heads and rejoice? and how sadly will the wicked world look then? O come, let us make haste, our Lord will come shortly! if we long to be in heaven, let us hasten with our work; for when that is done, away we shall be brought. O this vain, foolish, dirty world: I wonder how reasonable creatures can so doat upon it! What is in it worth the looking after? I care not to be in it longer than while my Master hath either doing or suffering work for me; were that done, farewell to earth."

This eminent saint had this testimony given him by one: "It may be said of him, in as high a degree as of most saints on earth, that each thought was to him a prayer, each prayer a song, each day a Sabbath, each meal a sacrament; and so his life on earth a foretaste of that eternal repast to which he hath now arrived."

34. The noble Marquis of Argyle, being a zealous friend of our covenanted Reformation, was put to death, May 27th, 1661. His friends contrived methods for making his escape out of the castle of Edinburgh, but he thanked them, and told them, he would not disown the good cause he had so publicly espoused, but resolved to suffer the utmost. When the sentence of death was passed by the Parliament, on Saturday, May 25th, he said, "I had the honour to set the crown upon the king's head, and now he hastens me to a better crown than his own." Then he was sent to the tolbooth. His excellent lady embracing him when he entered, wept bitterly, saying several times, The Lord will requite it. Not any in the room could restrain from tears; but the Marquis himself was perfectly composed, and said, "Forbear, forbear; truly I pity them, they know not what they are doing: they may shut me in where they please, but they cannot shut out God from me. For my part, I am as content to be here as in the castle, and as content in the castle as in the tower of London" (where he was first put), "and as content upon the scaffold as any of them all." He added, that he remembered a scripture passage cited to him by an holy minister in the castle, and endeavoured to put in practice, when Ziklag was taken and burned, and the people spoke of stoning David, he encouraged himself in the Lord his God. All his short time, till Monday, he spent with the greatest serenity and cheerfulness, and in the proper exercises of a dying Christian. He said to some ministers, allowed to be with him in the prison, that "shortly they would envy him who was got before them." And added, "Mind that I tell you, my skill fails me, if you who are ministers will not either suffer much, or sin much; for though you go along with these men in part, if you do it not in all things, you are but where you were, and so must suffer; and if you go not at all in with them, you shall but suffer."

The marquis was naturally timorous, but he desired those about him to observe, as he could not but do, that the Lord had heard his prayer, and removed all fears from him. And indeed his friends' work was to restrain and qualify his fervent longing after his dissolution, and not to support him under the near views of it. The Lord was exceeding kind to him at this time; for upon Monday morning, that day he suffered, when he was in the midst of company, and thronged in subscribing papers relating to his estate, he was so overcome with a singular manifestation from God, that he broke out in a rapture and said, "I thought to have concealed the Lord's goodness, but it will not do; I am now ordering my affairs, and God is scaling my charter to a better inheritance, just now saying to me, 'Son, be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee.'" After he had retired some time alone, when he opened the door, Mr. Hutchinson, one of the ministers that attended him, said to him, What cheer, my Lord? He answered, Good cheer, Sir, the Lord hath again confirmed and said to me, from heaven, "Son, be of good cheer, thy sins are forgiven thee." And he gushed out in abundance of tears of joy, so that he retired to the windows and wept there. Afterwards he said, in a perfect rapture, to Mr. Hutchinson, "I think his kindness overcomes me; but God is good to me that lets not too much of it here, for he knows I could not bear it: get my cloak, and let us go." But being told that the town clock was kept back, so that the hour was not yet come, he answered, They are far in the wrong; and presently kneeled down and prayed before all present, in a most sweet and heavenly manner, to the ravishment of all that were there.

When he was going out to the scaffold, he said, I could die like a Roman, but I choose rather to die as a Christian. Come away, gentlemen, he that goes first goes cleanest. When going down, he called Mr. James Guthrie to him, and embracing him in the most endearing way, took his farewell of him. Mr. Guthrie, at parting, addressed the marquis, "My Lord, God hath been with you, he is with you, and God will be with you; and such is my respect for your lordship, that if I were not under the sentence of death myself, I could cheerfully die for your lordship."

So they parted for a very short season, in two or three days to meet in a better place.

The marquis, in his speech on the scaffold, hath these words, "God hath laid engagements upon Scotland; we are tied by covenant to religion and reformation. Those that were then unborn are engaged to it, and it passeth the power of any under heaven to absolve a man from the oath of God."

35. Mr. John Welsh, minister of the gospel at Ayr, whom Mr. Rutherford, in his preface to his survey of Antinomianism, calls that apostolic, heavenly, and prophetic man of God, and there tells us, that he had it from those that were witnesses of his life, that of every twenty-four hours, he gave usually eight to prayer, and that he spent many nights in prayer to God, interceding for suffering Protestants abroad, as well as for his mother church. This holy man, when prisoner in the castle of Blackness, and in the view of death, being condemned to it for maintaining the liberties of this church, though afterwards the sentence was changed into banishment, in his letter to a Christian lady, hath these words:—"I long to eat of that tree which is planted in the midst of the paradise of God, and to drink of the pure river, clear as crystal, that runs through the street of the New Jerusalem. I long to be refreshed with the souls of them that are under the altar, who were slain for the word of God, and the testimony that they held; and to have those long white robes given me, that I may walk in white raiment with those glorious saints, who have washed their garments, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Why should I think it a strange thing to be removed from this place to that where my hope, my joy, my crown, my elder brother, my head, my father, my comforter, and all the glorious saints are, and where the song of Moses and the Lamb is sung joyfully; where we shall not be compelled to sit by the rivers of Babylon, and hang up our harps on the willow trees, but shall take them up, and sing the new Hallelujah, blessing, honour, glory, and power, to him that sits upon the throne, and to the Lamb for ever and ever? What is there under the old vault of the heavens, and in this old worn earth, which is groaning under the bondage of corruption, that should make me desire to remain here? I expect that new heaven and new earth, wherein righteousness dwelleth, wherein I shall rest for evermore. I look to get entry into the New Jerusalem at one of those twelve gates, whereupon are written the names of the twelve tribes of Israel. I know that Jesus Christ hath prepared them for me. Why may I not then, with boldness in his blood, step into that glory, where my Head and Lord hath gone before me? Jesus Christ is the door and the porter; who then shall hold me out? O thou fairest among the children of men, the delight of mankind, the light of the Gentiles, the glory of the Jews, the life of the dead, the joy of angels and saints, my soul panteth to be with thee. I refuse not to die with thee, that I may live with thee; I refuse not to suffer with thee, that I may rejoice with thee. O when shall I be filled with his love! Surely, if a man knew how precious it is, he would count all things but dross and dung to gain it. I long for that scaffold, or that axe, or that cord, that might be to me that last step of this my wearisome journey, to go to thee, my Lord. Who am I, that he should first have called me, and then constitute me a minister of the glad tidings of the gospel of salvation these many years, and now, last of all, to be a sufferer for his cause and kingdom? These two points, 1. That Christ is the head of the church. 2. That she is free in her government from all other jurisdiction, except Christ; yea, as free as any kingdom under heaven, not only to convocate, hold, and keep her meetings and assemblies; but also to judge of all her affairs among her members and subjects: these are the cause of our sufferings. I would be most glad to be offered up a sacrifice for so glorious a truth; but, alas! I fear that my sins, and the abuse of so glorious things as I have found, deprive me of so fair a crown: yet my Lord knoweth, if he would call me to it, and strengthen me in it, it would be to me the most glorious day, and gladdest hour I ever saw in my life; but I am in his hands, to do with me whatsoever shall please him," &c.

This eminent saint spent much of his time in the mount of prayer and wrestling with God, was admitted to very intimate nearness with him, and had many secret things revealed to him from God. He used to say, "He wondered how a Christian could lie in bed all night, without rising to spend some of the night in prayer and praise."

In his last illness he had a great weakness in his knees, caused by his continual kneeling at prayer, the flesh thereof became insensible, and hard like a sort of horn; but, when in his weakness he was desired to remit somewhat of his former painfulness, his answer was, he had his life of God, and therefore it should be spent for him. During his sickness he was so filled with the sensible enjoyment of God, that he was sometimes overheard in prayer to have these words: "Lord, hold thy hand; it is enough; thy servant is a clay vessel, and can hold no more."

36. Mr. Christopher Love, minister of Laurence-jury in London, who was beheaded on Tower-hill, Aug. 62, 1651, in time of Cromwell's usurpation, and for suspected plotting against his government, his words on the scaffold were most pathetic and weighty: "Although, said he, there be but little between me and death, yet this bears up my heart, there is a little between me and heaven. It comforted Dr. Taylor, the martyr, when he was going to execution, that there were but two stiles between him and his Father's house: there is a lesser way between me and my Father's house, but two steps between me and glory. It is but lying down upon that block, and I shall ascend upon a throne. I am this day sailing towards the ocean of eternity, through a rough passage to my haven of rest, through a Red sea to the promised land. Methinks I hear God say to me, as he did to Moses, Go up to mount Nebo, and die there; so to me, Go up to Tower-hill, and die there. Isaac said of himself, that he was old, and yet he knew not the day of his death; but I cannot say so. I am young, and yet I know the day of my death, and I know the kind of my death, and the place of my death also. I am put to such a kind of death, as two famous preachers of the gospel were put to before me, John the Baptist, and Paul the apostle. They were both beheaded. I read also in Rev. xx. 4, "The saints were beheaded for the word of God and testimony of Jesus." But herein is the disadvantage which I lie under in the thoughts of many; they judge that I suffer not for the word of God, or for conscience, but for meddling with state matters. To this I shall briefly say, that it is an old trick of Satan, to impute the cause of God's people's sufferings, to be contrivements against the state; when, in truth, it is their religion and conscience they are persecuted for. The rulers of Israel would have put Jeremiah to death upon the civil account, though indeed it was only the truth of his prophecy that made the rulers angry with him: and yet upon a civil account they pretended he must die, because he fell away to the Chaldeans, and would have brought in foreign forces to invade them. The same thing is laid to my charge, of which I am as innocent as Jeremiah was. So Paul, though he did but preach Jesus Christ, yet his enemies would have put him to death, under pretence that he was a mover of sedition. Upon a civil account my life is pretended to be taken away; whereas, it is because I pursue my covenant, and will not prostitute my principles and conscience to the ambition and lust of men. I had rather die a covenant-keeper, than live a covenant-breaker. Behold I am this day making a double exchange: I am changing a pulpit for a scaffold, and a scaffold for a throne: and I might add a third, I am changing the presence of this numerous multitude on Tower-hill, for the innumerable company of saints and angels in heaven, the holy hill of Zion; and I am changing a guard of soldiers for a guard of angels, which will receive me, and carry me to Abraham's bosom. This scaffold is the best pulpit that ever I preached in: In my church pulpit, God, through his grace, made me an instrument to bring others to heaven; but in this pulpit he will bring me to heaven." Afterwards he said, "Though my blood be not the blood of nobles, yet it is Christian blood, minister's blood; yea more, it is also innocent blood. I magnify the riches of God's mercy and grace towards me, that I who was born in Wales, an obscure country, and of obscure parents, should be singled out to honourable sufferings. For the first fourteen years of my life, I never heard a sermon preached; yet, in the fifteenth year of my age, it pleased God to convert me. Blessed be God, who not only made me a Christian, but also a minister, judging me faithful, and putting me into the ministry, which is my glory. I had rather be a preacher in a pulpit, than a prince upon a throne: I had rather be an instrument to bring souls to heaven, than that all nations should pay tribute to me. Formerly," said he, "I have been under a spirit of bondage; yea, sometimes I have had more fear in drawing out a tooth, than now I have for cutting off my head. When fear was upon me, death was not near; now, when death is near to me, my fear is evanished. I am comforted in this, though men kill me, they cannot damn me; though they thrust me out of the world, yet they cannot shut out of heaven. When I have shed my blood, I expect the full declaration of the remission of sins through the blood of Jesus Christ. I am going to my long home, and ye to your short homes; but I shall be at my home before you be at yours." He prayed, that, seeing "He was called to do the work which he never did, he might have the strength which he never had."

Dr. Wild, in his Elegy, hath these lines:

"Methinks I heard beheaded saints above
Call to each other, Sirs, make room for Love.
Who, when he came to tread the fatal stage,
(Which prov'd his glory, and his en'mies rage),
His blood ne'er ran to's heart; Christ's blood was there
Reviving it; his own was all to spare;
Which, rising in his cheeks, did seem to say,
Is this the blood you thirst for? Tak't I pray.
Spectators in his looks such life did see,
That they appear'd more like to die than he.
Lightnings, which filled the air with blazing light,
Did serve for torches at that dismal night;
In which, and all next day, for many hours,
Heav'n groan'd in thunder, and did weep in show'rs;
Nor do I wonder that God thunder'd so,
When Boanerges, murder'd, lay below."

37. Mrs. Joyce Lewis, being condemned to be burned for the protestant religion, in queen Mary's reign, when she heard that the writ for her execution was come, she said to her friends, "As for death, I fear it not: for, when I behold the amiable countenance of Jesus Christ, my dear Saviour, the ugly face of death doth not much trouble me."

38. Bullinger of Zurich, in his sickness, said to his friends, "If the Lord will make any farther use of me and my ministry in his church, I will willingly obey him; but if he please, as I much desire, to take me out of this miserable life, I shall exceedingly rejoice that he pleaseth to take me out of this corrupt and wretched age to go to my Saviour Christ. For," said he, "if Socrates was glad when his death approached, because, as he thought, he should go to Homer, Hesiod, and other learned men, whom he expected to meet with in the other world; how much more do I joy, who am sure that I shall see my Saviour Jesus Christ, as also the saints, patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and all the holy men who have lived from the beginning of the world? Now when I am sure to see them and partake of their joys, why should I not willingly die to enjoy their perpetual society and glory?"

39. Mr. Theodore Beza, a famous pastor in Geneva, when he apprehended the approach of death, revised his will, and so easing himself of all worldly thoughts, wholly betook himself to expect the time of his departure, which he had much longed for. He often used the apostle's saying, "We are his workmanship, created in Jesus Christ unto good works." And that of Augustine, Domine, quod cœpisti perfice, ne in portu naufragium accadat, "Lord, perfect that which thou hast begun, that I suffer not shipwreck in the haven." And that saying of Bernard; Domine, sequemur te, per te, ad te. Te, quia veritas; Per te, quia via: Ad te, quia vita. "Lord, we will follow thee, by thee, to thee. Thee, because thou art the truth; by thee because thou art the way: to thee because thou art the life."

40. Melancthon of Wittenberg, Luther's dear companion, said, "That he much longed to be dissolved, and that for two reasons: 1. That he might enjoy the much desired presence and sight of Christ, and of the heavenly church: 2. That he might be freed from the cruel and implacable discords of divines."

41. Mr. John Bradford, a minister and martyr in queen Mary's reign, when the keeper told him that the next day he was to be burned in Smithfield, he put off his cap, and, lifting up his eyes to heaven, said, "I thank God for it; it comes not now to me on a sudden, but as a thing waited for every day and hour; the Lord make me worthy thereof." One Cresswell, offering to interpose for him, and desiring to know what his request was; he said, "I have no request to make; if the queen give me my life, I will thank her; if she will banish me, I will thank her; if she will burn me, I will thank her; if she will condemn me to perpetual imprisonment, I will thank her." The chancellor pressing him to do as others had done, in hopes of the queen's mercy; he said, "My lord, I desire mercy with God's mercy; that is, without doing or saying any thing against God and his truth. But mercy with God's wrath, God keep me from. God's mercy," added he, "I desire, and also would be glad of the queen's favour, to live as a subject without clog on conscience: but otherwise, the Lord's mercy is better to me than life. Life in his displeasure is worse than death, and death in his favour is true life."

In his letter to Dr. Cranmer, Dr. Ridley, and Dr. Latimer, he had these words: "Our dear brother Rogers hath broken the ice valiantly. This day, or to-morrow at the utmost, hearty Hooper, sincere Saunders, and trusty Taylor, will end their course, and receive their crown. The next am I, who hourly look for the porter to open me the gates after them to enter into the desired rest. God forgive me my unthankfulness for this exceeding great mercy. Though I suffer justly, for I have been a great hypocrite, unthankful, &c. the Lord pardon me, yea, he hath done it, he hath done it indeed, yet, what evil hath he done? Christ, whom the prelates persecute, his truth which they hate in me, hath done no evil, nor deserved death. O what am I, Lord, that thou shouldst thus magnify me? Is it thy will to send for such a wretched hypocrite in a fiery chariot, as thou didst send for Elias?"

In one of his meditations, after confessing of sin, he said, "O what now may we do! despair? No, for thou art God, and therefore good; thou art merciful, and therefore thou forgivest sin: With thee there is mercy and propitiation, and therefore thou art worshipped. When Adam sinned, thou gavest him mercy before he desired it; and wilt thou deny us mercy, who now desire the same? Adam excused his fault, and accused thee; but we accuse ourselves, and excuse thee: and shall we be sent empty away? How often in the wilderness didst thou spare Israel, and defer the plague at the request of Moses, when the people themselves made no petition to thee! Now we do not only make our petition to thee, but also have a Mediator, far above Moses, to appear for us, even Christ Jesus thine own Son; and shall we, dear Lord, depart ashamed? O merciful Lord, for thine own glory, suffer not the enemy of thy Son Christ, the Romish antichrist, thus wretchedly to delude and draw from thee our poor brethren, for whom thy dear Son once died, &c. Suffer him not to seduce the simple sort with his fond opinion, that his false gods, his blind, mumbling, feigned religion, or his foolish superstition, give him such conquests, such victories, and such triumphs over us. But, O Lord, this is thy righteous judgment to punish us with the tyrannical yoke of blindness, because we have cast away from us the sweet yoke of the wholesome word of thy Son our Saviour."

In his letter to Mrs. Ann Warcup, he said, "My staff standeth at the door. I look continually for the sheriff to come for me; and I bless God I am ready for him. Now I go to practise that which I have preached; now I am climbing up the hill; it will cause me puff and blow before I come to the cliff. The hill is steep and high, my breath is short, and my strength is feeble. Pray therefore to the Lord for me, that, as I have now, through his goodness, even almost come to the top, I may, by his grace, be strengthened, not to rest until I come where I should be."

He was singular for humility and self-abasement, though a most eminent saint. He subscribed some of his letters, The most miserable, hard-hearted unthankful sinner, John Bradford. A very painted hypocrite, John Bradford. Miserrimus peccator, John Bradford. The sinful John Bradford.

42. Mr. Edward Deering, a little before his death, said to his friends, "As for my death, I bless God I feel and find so much inward joy and comfort to my soul, that, if it were put to my choice whether I would die or live, I would a thousand times rather choose death than life, if it may stand with the holy will of God."

43. Mr. Robert Rollock, when a-dying, prayed, "Lord, I have hitherto seen but darkly in the glass of thy word; now grant that I may enjoy the eternal fruition of thy countenance, which I have so much desired and longed for. Haste, Lord, and do not tarry; I am weary both of nights and days: Come, Lord Jesus, that I may come to thee. Break these eye-strings, and give me others. I desire to be dissolved, and to be with thee; haste, Lord Jesus, and defer no longer. Go forth, my weak life, and let a better succeed. O Lord Jesus, thrust thy hand into my body, and take my soul to thyself. O my sweet Lord, set this soul of mine free, that it may enjoy her husband."

44. Galeacius Carracciulus, marquis of Vico, when a-dying, took his leave of his wife and all his Christian friends, telling them that he would lead them the way to heaven. And he cried to Jesus Christ, that "as he had sought him all his life, so now he would receive and acknowledge him as his own."

45. The famous lord Duplessis in France, when a-dying, was much concerned for the church of God in distress, praying earnestly for her deliverance. He particularly blessed such of his grandchildren as were following the studies of learning, saying, that "he was assured they should be blessed with the blessings both of heaven above, and of the earth beneath." When a minister spoke of the service he had done the church by his writings, he said, "Alas, what was there of mine in that work? Say not that it was I, but God by me." Then lifting up his hands above his head, he cried three times, "Mercy, mercy, mercy." Adding, that he did it, to shew that it was alone the mercy of God to which he had recourse. And declared, that his "faith was altogether founded upon the goodness of God in Jesus Christ, who, by the Father, had been made unto him, as to all others that believed in him, wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption." "Away," said he, "away with all merit; I call for nothing but mercy, free mercy." When one was blessing God for giving him such peace and comfort at his end, he said, "I feel, I feel what I speak." As to his faith of the truths of God, "he said he was entirely persuaded thereof, by the demonstration of God's Holy Spirit, which was more powerful, more clear, and more certain, than all the demonstrations of Euclid." When secretly praying, he was overheard saying, in broken sentences, "I fly, I fly to heaven. Let the angels carry me to the bosom of my Saviour." Afterwards, he said, "I know that my Redeemer liveth, and I shall see him with these eyes, Hisc oculis;" which words he repeated four or five times.

46. Jerome of Prague, when he was fastened to the stake, and the executioner began to kindle the fire behind him, he bade him kindle it before his face. "For," said he, "if I had been afraid of it, I had not come to this place, having had so many opportunities offered me to escape it."

47. Mr. Hooker, a minister in New England, when one that stood weeping at his bed side, when he lay a-dying, said to him, "Sir, you are going to receive the reward of all your labours;" he replied, "Brother, I am going to receive mercy."

48. Mr. Heron, another minister there, when dying and leaving a family of many small children, his poor wife fell a-weeping, and said, Alas! what will become of all these children? He presently and pleasantly replied, "Never fear; he that feeds the young ravens will not starve the young Herons." And indeed it came to pass accordingly. It was an ancient observation concerning the English martyrs under the bloody Marian persecution, "That none of them went more joyfully to the stake than those who had the greatest families to commit unto the Lord."

49. Chrysostom, when the empress Eudoxa, an Arian, sent a threatening message to him, he said, "Go tell her, Nil nisi peccatum timeo, I fear nothing but sin." When he was sentenced to banishment, he said, "None of these things trouble me; for I said before within myself, If the empress will, let her banish me; the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof. If she will, let her saw me asunder; Isaiah was so used: if she will, let her cast me into the sea; I will remember Jonah: if she will, let her cast me into a burning fiery furnace, or to the wild beasts; the three children and Daniel were so served: if she will, let her stone me, or cut off my head; I have St. Stephen and the Baptist for my companions: if she will, let her take away all my substance; "Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither again."

But I must break off, for time would fail me to enumerate the many instances of the faith, love, patience, hope, courage, and constancy of the saints and martyrs of Jesus, when in the view of death. Some have told the persecutors, "That they might pull the hearts out of their bodies, but they could never pluck the truth out of their hearts." Others have said, "That if every hair of their heads were men, they should all suffer for Christ and his truths." "Oh, said one of them, can I die but once for Christ?"

To conclude, let these examples prompt us to seek grace from God, and make it our earnest study to imitate and follow such a cloud of witnesses, that we may die martyrs in resolution, our graces may be most lively at the last, our evening sun may shine brightest, and we may go off the stage glorifying God, and leaving a sweet savour behind us, as these famous worthies, whose praise is in the churches, have done before us.

DIRECT. VII.—LET DYING PERSONS BE MUCH IN PRAYER AND EJACULATIONS TO GOD.

PRAYER is the native breath of renewed souls; it is as necessary to their spiritual life, as breath is to the natural life, Lam. iii. 59, "Hide not thine ear at my breathing." The first thing a child of God doth, when he is new-born, is to breathe by prayer, Acts ix. 11, "Behold he prayeth." And it is also his last work in the world to pray, Acts vii. 59, 60; "And they stoned Stephen, calling upon God, and saying, Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. And he kneeled down, and cried with a loud voice, Lord, lay not this sin to their charge. And when he had said this, he fell asleep." A dying Christian hath many to pray for; he is to pray for the church of God, for his friends and relations, and also for his enemies, as Stephen did, of whom I spoke before. But especially he must pray for himself, that sin may be forgiven, and that he may have safe conduct through the dark valley. I have heard of some that have been found dead upon their knees. A noble posture to die in! How agreeable is it to enter praying into the land of praise! So did Stephen; yea, so did our blessed Saviour himself: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." The last words that holy Usher uttered were, "But, Lord, in a special manner, forgive my sins of omission." "Lord (said dying Beza), perfect that which thou hast begun, that I suffer not shipwreck in the haven." I remember to have read of an old minister, when he found death approaching, he said, "I desire to die like the poor thief, crying to the crucified Jesus for mercy. I am nothing, I have nothing, I can do nothing, except what is unworthy. My eye, and hope, and faith, is to Christ on his cross. I bring an unworthiness like that of the poor dying thief unto him, and have no more to plead than he. Like the poor thief crucified with him, I am waiting to be received, by the infinite grace of my Lord, into his kingdom." Let us in like manner die, crying to a crucified Jesus for mercy, Lord, remember me, now thou art in thy kingdom.

O dying Christian, remember the time of prayer is near an end; after death there will be no more occasion for prayer. O then beg that the spirit of prayer may be so poured down upon you at this time, that you may be enabled to pour out your heart before God, both for yourself and others. O how earnestly should you pray then, when you are taking your leave of prayer! mind the example which your Redeemer gave you; it was before his death that he offered up prayers and supplication with strong crying and tears unto God. I acknowledge, sick and dying persons are frequently out of case for making prayers of any great length or continuance (which consideration should excite us to the greater diligence in prayer in the time of health), and therefore they ought to be the more frequent and fervent, in short and suitable ejaculations and petitions to God, as their exigencies require.

SOME MEDITATIONS AND EJACULATIONS, PROPER FOR SICK AND DYING PERSONS, AND ESPECIALLY FOR A DYING BELIEVER.

O LORD, thou art the God of my life, and hast the keys of death in thy hand. Thou hast measured the length of my life, and appointed the hour of my death. The number of my months and days is with thee, and thou hast appointed the bounds, over which I cannot pass.

What is my life but a vapour that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away? At the longest, how short is it; and at the strongest how weak! "What man is it that liveth here, and shall not see death? When a few days are come, I will go the way whence I shall not return." God hath decreed it, sin hath deserved it, my frailty demonstrates it, death's harbinger proclaims it, and I must expect it.

There is no discharge in this war, no exemption from death's stroke. Death's messengers are come to warn me, that my last day and hour draweth nigh. The sound of their master's feet is behind them. This clay-house must be dissolved, my soul dislodged, and my place here shall know me no more; I will be quickly as water spilt on the ground, that cannot be gathered up again.

O that I may be suitably exercised in my present weak and dying condition! when my flesh faileth, and my heart fainteth within me. O that God may be the strength of my heart, and portion for ever! When the keepers of the house tremble, let God watch over it, and be the keeper of my soul. When the grinders cease, because they are few, let my soul be fed with manna from heaven. When the daughters of music are brought low, let my soul be disposed for hearing the song of Moses and the Lamb in the temple above. When those that look out at the windows are darkened, let the eyes of my soul be enlightened to behold with the dying martyr Stephen, the heavens opened, and the glorious Jesus standing on the right hand of God, making intercession for me, and ready to receive me. Let my hope and desire look out at the windows, and say, "Why is his chariot so long a-coming? and why tarry the wheels of his chariot? Make haste, my beloved, and be thou like a roe or a young hart on the mountains of Bether."

O that I may observe the afflicting hand of God in my present sickness! Surely affliction cometh not out of the dust, nor doth trouble spring out of the ground. O Lord, rebuke me not in thine indignation, nor chasten me in thine hot displeasure. Have mercy on me, O Lord, for I am weak; and heal me, for my bones are vexed. When thou with rebukes dost correct man for iniquity, thou makest his beauty to consume away like a moth: surely every man is vanity. The sorrows of my heart are enlarged. O bring me out of my distresses. Look upon my affliction and my pain, and forgive all my sins. I look for sympathy to my great High Priest, who is touched with the feeling of my infirmities. My help and strength is in him.

O that, when I am afflicted, I may not despise the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when I am rebuked of him! Let me hear the rod, and him that hath appointed it. Let me kiss the rod, and accept of the punishment of mine iniquity. O that in my affliction I may be helped to humble myself greatly before the God of my fathers, and make a true and penitent confession of my sins!

Oh! what shall I say to thee O thou preserver of men? I will say, Lord, be merciful to me, heal my soul, for I have sinned against thee. I acknowledge, that, through an evil heart of unbelief, I have many a time departed away from the living God, O how vainly and foolishly have I lived in the world! How lavish of my precious time! How unmindful of my latter end! How careless of my immortal soul! How little in preparation for eternity! Oh! my own heart condemns me, my sins testify against me; and thou, who knowest them better than I do myself, together with their several aggravations, mightest justly condemn me too. But my comfort is, that with thee the Lord there is mercy that thou mayest be feared, and with thy Son there is plenteous redemption: wherefore, for his sake he pleased to forgive me all my bypast transgressions, whether in thought, word, or deed; those I remember, and those I have forgotten; and let them neither be charged on me to my shame and confusion in this world, nor to my everlasting ruin in that which is to come. Lord, forgive the follies of my childhood, the extravagances of my youth, and the iniquities of my riper years.

O I am polluted with sin, and dare not appear before God with my own filthy rags upon me. When Adam lost the garment of original righteousness, he fled from God, and dreaded the summons of offended justice. Now, there is no appearing before God with acceptance, but in the garment of his Son, my elder brother. None can have boldness to enter into the holiest of all, but by the blood of Jesus. O enable me to disclaim whatsoever duties I have performed, or graces I exercised, and to rely on a crucified Christ alone for pardon and life. Though thou slayest me, let me die trusting in and cleaving to a crucified Jesus.

Now the powers of darkness will seek to raise tempests to shipwreck the vessel of my soul, when it would enter into the eternal haven; O that like the wise mariner, when the storm approacheth, I may endeavour to secure the vessel with the anchors of faith and hope fastened on the rock Christ!

O that, when the time of combat with my last enemy cometh, I may above all take the shield of faith, whereby I may be sheltered from the sting of death, and may quench the fiery darts of the wicked one!

O that the Lord of hosts, the Captain of my salvation, may be with me in my last conflict, and may help me to put on the whole armour of God, and give me skill to use it, that I may be able to stand in the evil day! Teach my hands to war, and my fingers to fight, that through thee I may do valiantly, and tread down all mine enemies. O that now I may so finish my course, and fight the good fight of faith, that at death I may receive the crown of righteousness, which the righteous Judge will give to all that love his appearing. O that my faith may ripen into a full assurance, that I may go off the stage with joy, and an abundant entrance may be administered unto me into the kingdom of my Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

O that the night of my death may shine bright with the sparkling stars of heavenly grace! Lord, increase my faith! Let the pilgrim's staff of faith be never out of my hand, till I come to my journey's end. O let me get Christ all in my arms, like old Simeon before his death, that I may say like him, "Now let thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." Kindle the fire of heavenly love in my soul, and give me a taste of heavenly joys. O for one beam of thy light, to banish away all my doubts and fears! Lord, let in something of heaven to my soul, before itself go into heaven.

Lord, take me not out of this life till thou hast fitted me for a better. May I be fitted for heaven before I leave the earth, and finish my work before I finish my course! Make me ready to meet thee at thy coming, that so thy coming may not be the matter of my terror, but the matter of my hope, desires, and joyful expectations. O that I may be in a longing frame for that blessed time, when he will come and put a period to all my sins, sorrows, troubles, and temptations here, and when I shall exchange my present being in the body, for an everlasting being with the Lord! Lord, strengthen my faith and hope, that so neither the sweetness of life, the pain of death, nor apprehensions about my future state, may make me unwilling to die. Is my Redeemer ascended and gone before to prepare a place for me; why then should I be slothful to go in and possess the good land!

Mercy hath filled up all my life, and brought me near to the end of it; O let it not leave me now, when all the enjoyments of the world are as nothing to me, and I am to take an everlasting farewell of them all. Now one smile of thy face, one taste of thy love would be strength and joy to my departing soul. O remember the word to thy servant, upon which thou hast caused me to hope; hast thou not said, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee?" O fulfil this word to me in the time of my need. O let me never go off the stage with a heavy heart or a guilty conscience; but may I depart in peace and sleep in Jesus. Let me breathe out my departing soul to thee, and trust it in thy hand and safe keeping; and let my flesh rest in hopes of rising gloriously at the last day, through him who is the resurrection and the life, the Lord Jesus Christ.

Love and praise is the exercise of saints for ever; may I be acquainted with it here! O shall

I not love and praise him who hath forgiven all mine iniquities, healed all my diseases, redeemed my life from destruction, and crowned me with loving kindness and tender mercies? He hath caused goodness and mercy follow me all the days of my life; and shall I not follow him with praises at the end of it?

Now the time of my departure is at hand, and the lamp of my life is ready to be extinguished. O that I may die in faith, that whether the lamp go out of its own accord, or by some sudden blast, it may be lighted again by the immortal beams of the Sun of righteousness! And though I be overtaken with the sleep of death, and lie down in the bed of the grave; yet I shall awake again in the morning of the resurrection, that morning which shall never be succeeded by an evening; when I shall behold thy face in righteousness, and be eternally satisfied with thy likeness.

Now I am going the way of all the earth, ready to launch forth into eternity, where I shall be fixed in my everlasting condition. Grant me, Lord, the perfect use of my senses, of my reason and understanding, that I may glorify thy name, and edify my neighbours to the last moment of my departure. And now, when I am to conflict with the king of terrors, O support and assist me in my sorest extremities and last agonies! O mercifully mitigate death's pangs, and let my passage be easy, and my landing safe. Stand by me in my dying moments, and secure my soul in thy hands from all its deadly enemies. And, when I am numbered among the dead, let me also be numbered among the redeemed and blessed of the Lord for ever.

O Lord, thou determinest both the bounds of man's life, and the bounds of his habitation. If a hair of my head cannot fall to the ground without thy providence, far less can my whole body fall into the grave without it. Thou hast told me plainly that I must die, but mercifully hast thou concealed the time, place, and manner, that I may always stand upon my guard, every hour expect thy coming, and have my accounts in my hand, and always prepared to give them up to thee my Judge. Justly mightest thou have snatched me away by a surprising call and sudden stroke: but in thy goodness thou gavest me warning, and time to set my house and soul in order. O graciously finish what is now wanting of the work of grace in my heart and soul, and thoroughly accomplish and furnish me to appear in thy blessed presence. May I now die to sin every hour, that I may not die for sin hereafter. Cause sin wholly to die before me, that it may not rise in judgment against me after death.

O God, be thou my refuge and strength, and a very present help in trouble; and then I will not fear though the waters of affliction rage and be troubled, and though all the mountains of earthly comforts shake with the swelling thereof. There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God. O let my soul dwell beside these living streams, and drink of them for ever. In the valley of the shadow of death, Lord, be thou present as the good shepherd with thy guiding rod and supporting staff; and make my departure easy, and full of peace and hope. Lord, carry me safe through the dark passage upon which I am entering, and let me find it a gate of glory, a door opened into the everlasting kingdom and joy of the Lord. Lord Jesus, receive my spirit, and let it be presented justified and spotless to the Father, that it may come to the spirits of just men made perfect, and join with them in singing the new song, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain, and hath redeemed us to God by his blood, to receive power, honour, glory, and blessing for ever.—Amen."

SOME MEDITATIONS FOR DROOPING BELIEVERS, WHEN DEATH IS NEAR.

TRAVELLERS who have met with many storms, troubles, and dangers in their journeys, rejoice when they come near to their own country; and shall not I, a stranger and pilgrim, that have been long wandering in a wilderness, be glad when I come near my blessed home, my dear friends, and eternal habitation?

With what cheerfulness do some women endure the pains of child-bearing, being supported with the hopes of a child's being born into the world? And what is the joy of a man-child being brought into this sinful and miserable world, to the joy of a sanctified soul's being brought out of it into heaven for ever? It is pleasant when the hard winter goeth over, and the messengers of the spring, the singing of birds come: and shall not I rejoice, when sickness and forerunners of death tell me, that the winter of my darkness and trouble is past, and the summer of my eternal light and joy is at hand?

What though death be the king of terrors? Is not glorious Christ the King of comforts? Have not I met already with this blessed king; and why should I fear to meet with the other? O let my strength and support at this time come from Christ my covenanted Redeemer.

O Lord, deliver my soul from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling! O bring me out of the miry clay, set my feet upon a rock, and establish my goings, and put a new song in my mouth, even praises to our God!

If Jacob went down so cheerfully into Egypt, when God had said unto him, "Fear not to go down, for I will go down with thee, and I will bring thee up again;"—why should a believer fear to go down to the grave, when God hath undertaken to go down with him thither, and to bring him up again? His body may be turned into dust, but God is in covenant with his dust, and will not suffer the least particle of it to be lost.

Are not the righteous taken away from the evil to come? Do they not rest on their beds, and enter into peace? Why then should I grudge at dying? When the Lord is to bring heavy wrath and judgments on a land, he frequently houses many of his people in heaven before-hand: and how happy are those that get into the house before the sweeping hail-shower falls. A believer needeth not to look for any settled fair weather in this world: it will be nothing but one shower up and another down, till he be housed in heaven. O why then should I linger in this wilderness?

How highly dignified is the believer, in being made an heir of God, and a joint heir with his own Son Jesus Christ! So that Christ and the believer do as it were, divide heaven between them; they have the same Father, dwell in the same house, sit at the same table, reign on the same throne, and partake of the same glory. O what honour is this, which is put upon a worm of the earth! It is indeed but little that the young heir enjoys of the inheritance while in this world; no more than will serve to bear his charges to heaven, where he shall get all, forget his present straits, and remember his poverty no more. O why then should not I, like a young heir, be looking and longing for the expiring of my minority, when I shall arrive at a ripe age, and enter upon the full possession of the inheritance! O that I could send out faith and hope, those two faithful spies, to survey the promised land, or at least to visit the borders of my elder brother's country! What an encouraging report would they bring back! My glorious Lord is gone; he hath left the earth, and entered into his glory; my brethren and friends have many of them arrived there also. How great is the difference between my state and theirs! I am groaning out my complaints, but they are singing God's praise. I am in darkness, and cannot see God: but they are in light, and see him face to face. O my Lord, shall I stay behind, when they are gone? Should I be satisfied to wander in the wilderness, far distant from my Father and my God; when they are triumphing above, dividing the spoil? No: I will still look after them with a stedfast eye, and cry, O Lord, how long? I will wait now in hope, yea, rejoice in the forethoughts of the day; when my minority shall be expired, my pilgrimage finished, my banishment over, that I may get home to my country and friends above.

What though my days be dark and gloomy now, my winter be sharp and stormy? Why it is but short, and near over; the eternal summer approacheth! The long day, the high sun, and the fair garden of my well-beloved, above these visible heavens, will quickly make amends for all. Let me get up by faith and visit the new land, view the fair city, and behold the white throne, and the Lamb that sits thereon, that I may rejoice in hope of the glory of God.

Shall many heirs of wrath go singing and rejoicing to hell; and will an heir of God go drooping and sorrowing to heaven? O let not my bad behaviour on a death-bed, bring up a bad report upon Christ's good way, and the land which he hath purchased.

Have I such great and precious promises left me, and shall I not live and feed upon them in the time of my need? shall I not trust the word of him that is faithful and true? hath he not said to me, "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee: when thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burnt; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee!" When thy disciples were sore tossed with winds and waves, thou camest to them in the fourth watch of the night, walking on the waters; and when their fears were increased, thou saidst, "It is I, be not afraid." Thou rebukedst the wind, and there presently followed a great calm. My Redeemer's compassion continues; his bowels are not shut up this day, more than in the days of his flesh. "Jesus Christ is the same to-day, yesterday, and for ever."

Ah! I have too little improved my acquaintance with precious Christ in the day of my life! How ready am I to repine and mistake him, when he changeth his dispensations towards me! Though I have been long at Christ's school, what small proficiency have I made in the work and mystery of faith! how little have I learned to believe in the dark, and to drop an anchor at midnight upon the Rock of ages, and to look out for the dawning of the day!

Surely the day shall break, and the shadows flee away: my king cometh, my well-beloved is on his way; he hath sent his letter before him to warn me of it, saying, "Behold, I come quickly." O that, like the cold and wearied night-watch, I may be looking out for the appearing of the morning star, and the breaking of the eastern sky; and may be still crying, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

Thou hast said, "Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for all the upright in heart. Surely God's seed shall not lie always beneath the clods; the time is at hand, when it shall spring; and joyful will the crop be at last. O that like David in affliction, I could encourage myself in the Lord my God, and say, "The Lord liveth, blessed be my rock!" Why should I droop, while my Lord liveth and my Rock standeth? My hopes may die, my comforts die, my gifts die, my riches die, my relations die, and my body die; but, good news! "the Lord liveth, blessed be my rock." The disciples had a melancholy time while Christ was dead and lying in the grave; but that sad time is over, he is now risen and will die no more. Nay, he hath proclaimed it for my comfort, saying, "Fear not, I am the first and the last. I am he that liveth, and was dead; and behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hell and death."

When my soul is cast down within me, let me remember God from the land of Jordan, and the hill of Mizar; that I may reason myself out of all my fears and discouragements: for yet "the Lord will command his loving-kindness in the day-time, and in the night his song shall be with me, and my prayer to the God of my life."

"Why then art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God."

Now, when death is at hand, let not my Saviour be far off. He who remembered the dying thief, and spoke comfortably to him, let him now remember me when he is seated in his kingdom, and say to my soul, "This day thou shalt be with me in paradise." When it is absent from the body, let it be present with the Lord. Let the angels now be ready to do their office, to carry my departing soul into Abraham's bosom. Let me now depart, that I may be with Christ; yea, be for ever with the Lord, that I may see his face. Let me dwell there, where they have no night, need no candle, no light of the sun for ever; where God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow nor crying.

Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit. By the hands of him who hath redeemed it, let it be presented to thee without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing.

AN ADDITION OF SOME FURTHER MEDITATIONS PROPER FOR ANY SICK PERSON IN THE VIEW OF DEATH.

THE Lord is pleased sometimes to cast men down on beds of sickness, and draw the curtain between the world and them, that they may take a view of their by-past life and future state. Now is it time for me to look into my soul, and examine my state. O, how many miss salvation when they think themselves sure of it! They mistake a form of godliness for the power of it, and thereby deceive themselves, thinking themselves something when they are nothing.

Some come the length as to shed tears, as Esau did; profess fair, yea fight for the Lord, as Saul and Jehu did; wish for the end of the righteous, as Balaam did; desire God's people to pray for them, as Pharaoh and Simon Magus did; walk softly, and mourn for fear of judgment, as Ahab did; joy in gospel-ordinances, and reform in many things, as Herod did; prophesy and speak well of Christ, as Caiaphas and Judas did; be convinced and tremble at hearing a sermon, as Felix did; yea, taste the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, as apostates have done: and yet for all these attainments, remain strangers to the saving work of the Spirit on the heart.

O that the consideration of hypocrites' attainments might alarm me out of my security, and make me restless till I find the distinguishing marks of true grace and sincere faith in my soul!

O that I could say, there is a principle in me that will not suffer me to build on any foundation in the world but Christ and his righteousness; that makes me content with Christ, with all his offices, with all his precepts, and with his very cross for his sake! Doth the love of Christ keep me back from sin, more than the law or fear of hell? Have I aimed at God's honour in all my actions, civil, natural, and religious? Am I humble, and denied to my own will, wit, credit, ease, and honour, and to all the enjoyments of the world? Am I acquainted with the throne of grace, and desirous to keep up a constant correspondence with it? O let me not rest till I perceive those things in my soul which accompany salvation.

O how comfortable would it be to me now, if I could say with good Hezekiah in his sickness, "Remember now, O Lord, how I have walked before thee in truth, and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight!" O that I could pray, and say with Jesus my Saviour when in the view of death, "Father, I have glorified thee on earth; I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do: and now, O Father, glorify thou me with thine own self, with the glory which thou hast ordained for me before the world was!"

Alas, Lord, I must confess, my iniquities have gone up above mine head; my misspent time, my unfruitfulness under the means of grace, and waterings of ordinances, may cause me to cry out, Woe is me for the leanness of my soul, and barrenness of my heart! I have been an empty vine, bringing forth fruit only to myself. I have hid my Lord's money, and therefore deserve the doom of the wicked and slothful servant. But my relief is in my Surety's righteousness. Blessed be the Lord, who hath sent his Son to bless those who by nature lie under the curse, and to intercede for those who cannot speak for themselves. O how suitable is he to my soul's case! I have indeed a multitude of sins, but he hath a multitude of tender mercies; I have deep and heinous guilt, but he hath a deep fountain for washing it out; I am sold under sin, but he hath a ransom to buy me back again; my sore is broad, but his plaster is answerable; my wound is great, but his balm is excellent. Surely it is my wisdom to go to Christ with all my grievances, and always to lie and cry at my Redeemer's door.

O that now, when the sun of my life is setting, the blessed Sun of righteousness may arise and shine upon my soul! Goodness and merey hath followed me while I lived: O that Christ and glory may meet me when I die! I must acknowledge thy goodness; were this the last hour I had to live, and this the last word I had to speak in the world, I behoved to say, Lord, thou hast been a merciful and gracious God to me, my whole life hath been a continued tract of merey; Lord, crown the end of it with mercy also. Surely the sea is not so full of water, nor the sun so full of light, as thou art full of grace and mercy. O let not my sins stop the current of thy tender mercies at this time. Lord, drown all my sins in the sea of Christ's blood, that my soul may not be sunk by them in the ocean of divine wrath. Lord Jesus, embrace my perishing soul in thy arms: let thy cross be my security, and thy wounds my refuge.

O thou that hearest the young ravens which cry, be not silent to me at this time, lest, if thou be silent to me, I be like them that go down to the pit.

Lord, I am now called to the work I never did: give me the strength I never had. Surely it is an important matter to die, and my eternal state dependeth upon dying aright. What I do amiss in my life one day, I may amend it in the next; but not so here, I can die but once: if I mar this piece of work, I cannot come back to mend it again; if I forget any thing necessary for my journey, I cannot return to fetch it. O, a wrong step in going out of this life is highly dangerous. In one respect, it is like the sin against the Holy Ghost, and can never be forgiven; for I cannot come back to mourn for it. Of all the business I ever undertook, I have most need to take care of my dying.

O, is death coming to take down this earthly tabernacle, and to put the one-half of me in the dark grave, and the other half of me in heaven or in hell; and shall I give sleep to mine eyes, or slumber to mine eye-lids, till I find myself in that case, that I dare look death in the face, and dare hazard my soul upon eternity?

O to have right impressions of the certainty of death and the uncertainty of life! What is my life but a vapour, a sand-glass of sixty or seventy years, which will soon run out? eternity and a judgment seat are now hard upon me. The blast of the last trumpet is at hand. There will shortly be a proclamation by one (standing in the clouds,) that time shall be no more. The world looks large in men's eyes in time of health; but when the eye-strings break, the breath turns cold, and the imprisoned soul looks out at the window of the clay house, ready to leap out into eternity, can the world give any satisfaction? No, no, a lamp full of oil will be valued then more than a house full of gold. The finest things on earth will then appear nothing but a piece of painted dust and gilded clay. How gladly would the greatest worldling, then, give all his gold and silver, riches and honours, for one sight of Christ's fair face, one smile of his countenance? O wherefore should men in health neglect the market of grace, and slight the pearl of great price? Why should they spend their money for that which is not bread, and their labour for that which satisfieth not?

Lord, save me from the hypocrite's case at death, whose candle of profession and of hope burns and blazes fair all the way with him, but goeth out in the dark trance of death; and there he stumbles and falls, and shall rise no more. O that my profession and hope may be of God's creating! If God light my candle, then shall my feet be enlightened through the dark valley, and neither death nor hell shall be able to put it out.

Lord, subdue sin in me, and let it be continually dying now, that it may certainly be dead before me. God forbid that my sins should survive me!

Oh, that when the stroke of death dissolves my body, my soul may escape as a bird out of the snare of the fowler, and may ascend to the heavenly regions to enjoy God himself.

O let me look through the gates of mortality, and long for the jailor's coming to set me at liberty. God help me to overcome the love of life, and fears of death. If my neighbour lend me any thing, I pay it again with thanks, and shall I not restore my life to God with thanks, who hath been pleased to lend me it so long? Arise, and let me depart, for this is not my rest: heaven is my home, Lord bring me to it; the joys of it are too great to enter into me, O make me fit to enter into them.

While I lie on a sick bed, Lord help me to patience in my sickness without murmuring.

How willingly would the damned in hell endure my pains a thousand years, if they had any hopes of being saved at last! Blessed be God that my sickness is not in hell, that my pains are not eternal.

O that I may look on my afflictions as coming from the hand of him that is the Lord of health and of sickness, of life and of death; who killeth and maketh alive, bringeth down to the grave, and raiseth up again! That Sovereign and wise Lord hath determined the time when my affliction shall end, as well as the time when it began. Thirty-eight years were appointed the sick man at Bethesda pool; eighteen years the woman that Satan kept bound; twelve years to the woman with the bloody issue; ten days tribulation to those of Smyrna; three days plague to David. The number of the godly man's tears is registered in God's book; yea, the hairs of his head are numbered.

When David got his choice of his own chastisements, he chose rather to be corrected by the hand of God, than by any other means, saying, "Let me fall into the hands of the Lord, for his mercies are great." I was dumb, and opened not my mouth, because thou didst it. Glory to God, that I am fallen into his merciful hand. Hath God appointed that man's coming into the world shall be attended with pain and crying, and his going out of it with grief and trouble; and shall I quarrel at it? No, I desire humbly to undergo the correction of mine iniquity, and to bear the indignation of the Lord, because I have sinned against him. O that the sickness of my body may be a means of health to my soul! May I be chastened of the Lord, so that I may not be condemned with the world!

It is good for the believer that he is afflicted. Why? it springs from divine love, and it works for his soul's good. Affliction is a seal of his adoption, and no sign of reprobation. The purest gold is most often tried, the sweetest grape is hardest pressed, and the truest Christian is heaviest crossed. But O how soon will the Christian forget all his groans when he comes to heaven! As soon as Stephen saw Christ, though at a distance, he forgot all his wounds and bruises; he minded no more the terror of the stones about his ears, but sweetly yielded his soul into his Redeemer's hands.

I read of many in the gospel that by sickness and diseases were driven unto Christ, who, if they had enjoyed health and prosperity, would have neglected, like many others, to come to him. O blessed is that cross, that draweth a sinner to Christ, to lay open his own misery, and implore Christ's mercy. And blessed be that Christ, who never refuseth the sinner that cometh to him, though driven by affliction and misery. To whom shall such a distressed creature as I go, but to him who is the only physician, that can both cure my soul from sin, and my body from sickness?

Lord, thou never denied thy mercy to any sinner that asked it with a penitent heart. There were many sorts of sick sinners that came to thee in the days of thy flesh; the blind, the deaf, the lame, the lepers; those that were sick of palsies, dropsies, fevers, fluxes, and were possessed with devils: and yet never one of them came crying for mercy, that went away without his errand, were his sin never so great, his disease never so grievous. Nay, so merciful is my Redeemer, that he offered and gave his mercy to many that never asked it, being moved with the bowels of his own compassion, and the sight of their misery; so dealt he with the woman of Samaria, the widow of Nain, and the man that lay thirty-eight years at the pool of Bethesda. Oh, if he gave his mercy so willingly to them that did not ask it, and was found of them that sought him not, will he deny mercy to my soul that is crying for it? There is but a step between me and death; Lord, seal my pardon to me, before I go hence and be no more. O draw nigh to me, and save me: for my soul is full of trouble, and my life draweth nigh unto the grave. Thy loving-kindness is better than life; O make me sure of that, and I will willingly part with this mortal life.

O thou who willest not that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance; be pleased to make use of the chastisement of my body, as a medicine to cure my soul, and bring me to a true and sincere repentance. One day is with thee as a thousand years; O work in me in this, which may be my last day, whatsoever thou seest wanting in me. Enable me to present unto thee the sacrifice of a broken and contrite heart, which thou hast promised not to despise. Give a true and lively faith in the blessed Jesus, who is the propitiation for our sins. He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was upon him; O heal me by his stripes. Let the cry of his blood drown the clamour of my sins. I am indeed a child of wrath, but Christ is the Son of thy love; O pity me for his sake, and let my soul find sanctuary in his wounds.

O Lord, the waters of affliction are come in even unto my soul; O let the Spirit of God move on those waters, that, like the pool of Bethesda, they may cure whatever spiritual diseases thou seest in me. O Lord, consider my affliction, accept my tears, assuage my pain, increase my patience, and finish my troubles. Correct me with the chastisement of a Father, and not with the wounds of an enemy, and though thou take not off thy rod, Lord, take away thine anger.

Lord, the prince of this world cometh, O let him have nothing in me; but, as he accuseth, do thou absolve. I have nothing to say for myself, but be thou my advocate, Lord; and do thou answer for me. I am clothed with filthy garments, and Satan stands at my right hand to resist me; O Lord rebuke him, and pluck me as a brand out of the fire. Cause mine iniquities to pass from me, and clothe me with the righteousness of thy dear Son. I know, O Lord, that no unclean thing can enter into thy kingdom, and thou seest I am nothing but pollution; yea, my very righteousness is filthy rags: O wash me, and make me white in the blood of the Lamb, that I may be fit to stand before thy throne. O take me from the tents of Kedar to the mansions of light and purity. When my earthly house of this tabernacle is dissolved, O let me have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. O bring my soul out of prison, that I may eternally give thanks unto thy name. Amen.

CHAPTER VIII.

CONTAINING DIRECTIONS TO THE FRIENDS AND NEIGHBOURS OF THE SICK, WHO ARE THEMSELVES IN HEALTH FOR THE TIME.

WHEN the Lord sends sickness and affliction to our neighbours, we ought not to be idle and unconcerned spectators of his dispensations; but we should hearken to the voice of God's rod upon others, and consider what it is that the Lord is calling for at our hands. These following Directions may be useful to those that are in health.

DIRECT. I.—BE VERY THANKFUL TO GOD FOR THE GREAT MERCY OF HEALTH AND STRENGTH, AND IMPROVE IT TO HIS GLORY.

SURELY an healthful person hath still great cause to be a thankful person. Health is a mercy that seasons and sweetens every other temporal mercy; without it the greatest wealth and honours, nay, a king's crown, can give no satisfaction. It is far more eligible to be a healthy beggar than a sickly king. What comfort could it afford us, under tossing sickness and torturing pains, to have the greatest heaps of money to look to, or thousands coming to pay us homage; alas, for our unthankfulness to him who is the God of our health! How little do we prize his goodness, in continuing with us such a long tract of health and strength, together with the use of our reason and senses, when many others are deprived of them. Surely God were righteous, should he teach us to value the worth of those mercies by the want of them.

Let us consider how many miserable persons there are in the world, and who it is that maketh us to differ from them; how many diseased, distracted, deformed, lame, blind, deaf, and dumb people there are; and how easy it had been for God to have put us in their condition, and them in ours. The difference is not owing to any thing in us: their sins are not greater than ours. Had we a due sense of our sins and ill-deservings, we would acknowledge ourselves unworthy of the least of all God's mercies; we would reckon every common mercy a special blessing, and an unmerited favour to us.—Again, let us take a view of the fainting sickness, racking pains, and restless nights of others. Let us look upon our sick friends sweating and burning under fevers, let us hear them groaning and moaning under strong pain. "Their soul abhors all manner of meat, and they draw near unto the gates of death." Sometimes we see them panting and fainting, and not able to speak a word to us. And what is the language of all this to us? Is it not that we should thankfully adore our gracious God, and bless and magnify him, for his distinguishing goodness to us? O how much are we bound to the Lord, that it is not so with us as with others! While wearisome nights are appointed to them, and their bones are full of tossing; all the comforts of this life are tasteless to them, their friends are weeping about them, but cannot help them. "It is far otherwise with me (may you say), my mercies and relations are comfortable and helpful to me, I relish my food, my bed gives me ease, my sleep is refreshing; I have freedom to read and pray, meditate and attend the public ordinances. 'Praise the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless his holy name.' Forget not this benefit of health, that is the chief of all my outward blessings. Some would part with all their worldly wealth, to have so much bodily health as I have. Long have I undervalued and abused this choice mercy of health: O that I could mourn for my neglect, and resolve in God's strength to improve my remaining health, for the praise and service of that merciful God who is the author and preserver of it! let me spend and be spent for God, that gives me all my health and strength for his glory. Let me abhor the ingratitude of those who employ the health which God giveth in the service of his enemies; and make a sacrifice of it to the devil, the world, and the flesh. O what prodigious folly are those guilty of, who, for satisfying their sensual appetite, often deprive themselves of health, which is in itself a thousand times of more value than all their brutish pleasures! God help me to prize this mercy, that can never be prized enough."

DIRECT. II.—MAKE CONSCIENCE OF VISITING YOUR SICK FRIENDS AND NEIGHBOURS, BELIEVING THAT IT IS YOUR DUTY AND INTEREST TO DO IT.

VISITING of the sick is not only the duty of the ministers of Christ, but likewise of all the members of Christ; for we are all enjoined to remember them that are in adversity, and to sympathize with the afflicted, as being ourselves also in the body. "To him that is afflicted, pity should be shown by his friends," said Job. And our Lord gives it as a character of those whom he will own and acquit at the great day, Mat. xxv. 36, "I was sick, and ye visited me." This is the way to be like him, who is the Father of mercies, and whose "soul was grieved for the miseries of Israel," Jndges x. 16. We read how tenderly David sympathized with his enemies when they were sick, Psal. xxxv. 13, 14, and much more ought we to visit and sympathize with our sick friends. To visit the prosperous and healthy, is an act of curiosity and civility, but to visit the afflicted and sickly, is an act of charity and Christianity.

And as it is your duty, so it is your interest and advantage to visit the sick. The wise man tells you, Eccl. vii. 2, "It is better to go to the house of mourning, than to the house of feasting." King Joash went to see Elisha in his sickness, and wept over him: and he lost nothing by so doing, 2 Kings xiii. 14, for he obtained thereby three famous victories over the Syrians. Though it be not warrantable to inquire at the dead, Deut. xviii. 11, yet we may learn many wholesome lessons from the dying, and even though they be speechless. As for instance, we may hereby be instructed how to prize health, mind our own frailty, and provide for the time of sickness. When we behold their strength languishing, their tongue faltering, their eyes failing, their countenance pale; we should think with ourselves, "This will be my case ere long; the next arrow that death shoots, may be levelled at me: how much is it my concern to prepare for it!" Also we may think, what a bitter thing sin is, that it is the cause of all those pains and distresses; and how mad they are who love sin and take pleasure in it. We may see likewise the great folly of courting and trusting the world, which leaves the sick and dying man in the midst of his greatest extremity. And we may observe, how happy the man is that hath an interest in Christ, the peace of a good conscience, and a well-grounded hope of heaven, to yield support and confidence to him under his strugglings with sickness and death. When we hear the dying man's complaints of his sins, and his lamenting his neglect of duty, and mispending of precious time, we may learn repentance and reformation. When we observe their professions of love to Christ, and their hope in him to the last, it doth contribute to the quickening and strengthening of our faith. A right sight of dying persons, is a good mean to increase the spirit of grace and supplication in us. We may fitly allude here to the answer which Elijah gave to Elisha, when he sought a double portion of his spirit, 2 Kings ii. 10, "If thou seest me when I am taken from thee, it shall be so unto thee." A double portion of the Spirit shall be the allowance of those who make conscience of this duty.

DIRECT. III.—LET THE FRIENDS OF THE SICK, AND THOSE WHO VISIT THEM, DEAL FAITHFULLY WITH THEM ABOUT THEIR SOULS.

CONSIDER this may be the last opportunity you may have of doing any thing for your friend's soul. If he die, he is fixed in his everlasting state, so that all advices and counsels then will be fruitless. It is now, or never, you must exert yourself for your friend's advantage; there is no knowledge nor wisdom in the grave, to which he is going; "God's loving kindness cannot be declared in the grave, nor his faithfulness in destruction," Psal. lxxxviii. 11. Now is the proper time for doing good to your neighbour's soul. When affliction opens the ear to discipline, be careful to drop in wholesome instructions into it; and when the heart is made tender by sickness, it is a fit season for good counsel to make impressions on it. Let the opportunity then be improved with faithfulness and prudence. And, in order thereto, observe the following advices.

I. Labour to know the sick man's spiritual condition, that your applications may be suitable thereunto. The knowledge of the disease is previously requisite unto the cure; as the mistake of a physician about a man's disease may be as dangerous as the disease itself, so here it is highly dangerous to mistake the case of the sick man's soul; for then lenitives may be applied, when corrosives are needful; promises may be administered, when threatenings are more proper.

II. Beware of flattering the sick with vain hopes of life, when he is more likely to die; lest he be thereby tempted to delay or slacken his preparation for another world. It is fit that plainness be used with respect to his dangers, that he may be quickened to his work.

III. The sick person is to be admonished and told, that sickness comes not by chance, nor by second causes merely; but by the wise direction and special providence of God; that sometimes God smites out of displeasure for sin, and for the sinner's correction and amendment; and sometimes for the trial and exercise of his people's graces; that the sharpest afflictions shall work together for good to them that love God, and are rightly exercised under God's hand; that it is a great mercy to a sinner, when God by his rod gives him warning and space to repent, and flee to the blood of sprinkling, and to cry to God for pardon, and doth not snatch him out of the world, by a sudden death. Upon which account the voice of the rod should be carefully hearkened to and thankfully obeyed.

IV. If the sick person be ignorant, he is to be catechised and instructed in the principles of religion, especially concerning his faith and repentance, and his uptaking of the covenant of grace, and the method of pardon and salvation through the righteousness of Christ apprehended by faith. And it may be proper to demand his assent to some of the fundamental truths of Christianity, or his answer to such questions as these: 1. Do you believe in God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, one God in three persons, the Maker and Governor of the world? 2. Do you believe that Jesus Christ, who assumed our nature, obeyed the law, died on the cross, rose from the dead, and ascended to heaven, is the eternal Son of God, and the only Saviour of sinners? 3. Are you sensible that you are a lost sinner by Adam's fall, and, besides that, guilty of innumerable actual sins; and that you have broken God's holy commandments in thoughts, words, and deeds, and, for so doing, deserve God's wrath both in this life and that which is to come? 4. Are you truly grieved and sorry for breaking God's law, neglecting his worship, mispending your time, and pursuing the vanities of the world? And would you do as you have done, or live otherwise if you were to begin your life again? 5. How do you think to get your guilt removed, your sins pardoned, and your peace made up with God? Are you desirous from your heart to be reconciled to God through Jesus Christ, the blessed Peace-maker? 6. Do you heartily approve of the gospel-method of reconciliation, by the righteousness and sacrifice offered by the Lord Jesus Christ, as your Surety, in your name and stead? And is your soul desirous to choose and accept of Christ for your Mediator and Saviour, in all his offices of Prophet, Priest, and King? 7. Do you renounce all confidence in any other, all dependence on your duties and righteousness, and put your whole trust and confidence in Christ, and the merits of his death and blood, saying, "Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none on all the earth that I desire besides thee." Do you believe that there is no salvation in any other, and that there is no name under heaven whereby you can be saved, but Jesus Christ only? 8. Do you desire to be wholly renewed and sanctified by virtue of Christ's blood, and to show forth the reality of your faith by good works and a holy life, for the time you have to live in the world? And, as an evidence thereof, are you willing to restore what you have taken wrongfully from any, and to forgive all wrongs done to you by any, and cast out all malice or hatred you have borne to any, and ask forgiveness of any you have injured? 9. Do you believe that Christ is coming at the last day to judge all the world, both the quick and the dead, whom he shall then raise from the grave, and that your dead body shall rise with the rest? 10. Do you believe the immortality of the soul, and its living in a separate state after death, and that the souls of believers immediately pass into glory, where they shall ever be with the Lord?

V. In dealing with the sick, you are to separate between the precious and the vile, and to make a difference between the converted and the unconverted. And seeing different applications are requisite, you are, according to your knowledge, to study to suit your counsels, admonitions, and prayers, to their state and condition; not using the same words to the ungodly as you use to the godly, lest you flatter them with ill grounded hopes that their state is safe, while they are strangers to a work of regeneration. That great truth is to be declared to all, that "unless a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." O it is dangerous to speak peace, where God speaks war.

VI. If the sick person seem to be secure, or have not a due sense of his sins, endeavours must be used to convince him of the guilt, pollution, and danger of them, in order to his humiliation. Presumptuous sinners are not to be flattered, lest we betray their souls into eternal ruin, and so their blood be required at our hand. No fond love, no slavish fear, must keep us from telling them the hazards of their present state. Their secure conscience must be awakened to see the demerit of sin, and the terribleness of the justice of a sin-revenging God, before whom no Christless impenitent sinner can stand: this is necessary in order to a sinner's discovering his lost case in himself, and his fleeing to Christ for refuge. It is God's method, first to cast down the soul before he lift it up; to plough the heart by conviction, before he cast in the seed of consolation.

VII. If the sick person hath studied to walk uprightly, but is at present discouraged upon account of the sharpness of the rod, Satan's temptations, the guilt of sin, the fear of death, or the like; then suitable counsels, resolutions, and comforts, are to be tendered, in order to his settlement and support. Particularly, he may be told, that sharp rods are no ways inconsistent with divine love; nay, frequently, they are a sign of it: for, as standing waters turn corrupt, because they have no current; and those who are not poured from vessel to vessel, their taste remains, and their scent is not changed; therefore God, in order to take away the scent of the corrupt nature from us, is pleased to change us from state to state, by crosses and sickness, to salvation.

And as Noah's ark, the higher it was tossed with the flood, the nearer it mounted towards heaven; so the sanctified soul, the more it is exercised with affliction, the nearer it is lifted towards God. Again, it is proper to set before him the freeness and fulness of God's grace, the sufficiency of righteousness in Christ, and his rich and gracious offers in the gospel; by which we are assured, that all who repent and believe with their heart in God's mercy through Christ, renouncing their own righteousness, shall not perish in their sins, but have life and salvation in him, and that believers in Christ are assured of victory over Satan, death and all their enemies, because Christ their head hath, by his cross, conquered the devil, unstung death, triumphed over the grave, and obtained victory for all his members; so that neither life nor death, principalities nor powers, shall be able to separate them from God's love in Christ.

VIII. If a sick man be so tempted and troubled in conscience, that he is in hazard of despairing of God's mercy; it is necessary to inform him of the greatness and infiniteness of God's mercy, that the most notorious sinners have been pardoned and saved by it, and it is still offered in the gospel to the vilest of sinners. Though God foresaw all the sins which the world would commit, yet these did not hinder him from so loving the world that he gave his only begotten Son to death, to save as many as would believe and repent; so that the sins of one man can never hinder God from loving his soul, and forgiving his sins, when he sincerely desires to repent and believe. The cry of the most grievous sins that are recorded, such as those of Sodom, could never reach higher than unto heaven, Gen. xix. 13. But David assures us, Psal. cviii. 4, that the mercy of God is great, and reaches up higher than the heavens, so that it over-toppeth the greatest of all our sins. If the mercy of God be greater than all his works, it must surely be greater than all our sins.

Again, lay before him the infinite virtue of Christ's blood: why? It is not the blood of a mere man, but the blood of God, Acts xx. 28. And, are there any sins so great, or guilt so heinous, but the blood of God can wash away? This was godly Cranmer's support that day he suffered martyrdom, when his sin of renouncing the Protestant doctrine stared him in the face: "Surely," said he, "God was made flesh, and shed his blood, not for lesser sins only, but for great sins also." He was sadly discouraged, and wept abundantly, till he eyed this meritorious blood, and then he took heart, and died with courage. O this price was so great, that it could have merited pardon for the sins of all the devils in hell, as well as for all the men on earth, though every one of them had been red as crimson. Yea, the least drop of this blood is of more merit to procure the mercy of God for our salvation, than all our sins can be of force to provoke the wrath of God for our damnation. Why? The greatest of our sins are but the sins of a man, but the least drop of Christ's blood is the blood of God.

Moreover, let him be put in mind of the willingness and readiness of our Redeemer to receive all sinners that came to him in the days of his flesh, though driven to him by sickness and affliction; so that he never put any of them away without their errand, that came crying for mercy. Nay; he many times sought out objects of his mercy, that were not thinking of coming to him, as showed before. Observe the gentleness of our Lord's carriage to Judas himself, in calling him friend after his most treacherous dealing, Mat. xxvi. 50, "Friend," said he, "wherefore art thou come?" Had wretched Judas laid hold on the word friend out of the mouth of Christ, as Benhadad did the word brother from the mouth of Ahab; doubtless Judas should have found the God of Israel more merciful than Benhadad found the king of Israel.

Lastly, Let him consider, that to despair of God's mercy casts the greatest dishonour upon the divine majesty, and is a sin more heinous than all the sins which we have before committed. Why? It charges the great God as guilty of perjury, who hath solemnly sworn that he desires not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should repent and live, Ezek. xxxiii. 11. God was more displeased with Cain for despairing of his mercy, than for murdering of his brother; and with Judas for hanging himself, than for betraying his master. Why? Because that by their despair they would make the sins of mortal men greater than the infinite mercy of the eternal God.

DIRECT. IV.—BE EARNEST IN PRAYER TO GOD FOR YOUR FRIENDS, WHEN SICK OR DYING. PRAY WITH THEM AND FOR THEM.

FREQUENTLY sick persons are so disquieted with pain and trouble, that they are out of case to pray for themselves, and therefore they have the more need of the prayers of others. David fasted and prayed for his enemies, when they were sick, Psal xxx. 13, much more ought we to pray for our friends in that case. Never did they need our prayers so much, as when they are called to enter upon an unchangeable condition, to go to their long home, even that place wherein they must abide for ever. Now they are in the land of prayer, and it is now or never that you must pray and beg mercy for them. When their life is gone, they go from the land of prayer, and are fixed in that place, whence they shall never remove: then all your prayers and cries for them will be in vain. If your friend be a stranger to Christ, he is on the brink of hell, and knows it not; and will you not cry to God to open his eyes, and save him from falling into that devouring pit out of which there is no redemption? You would be willing to sit up a whole night for the relief of his body; and will you not spend a part of a night for the good of his soul, that is a thousand times more valuable! Now the question is, whether this precious soul shall be Christ's or the devil's for ever? And when will you wrestle for your friend, if you do it not now? If the sick person be a child of God, you may pray for him with the more comfort, and expectation to be heard. You may, in that case, send the same message by prayer to Christ, that the sister of sick Lazarus did, John xi. 3, "Lord, behold he whom thou lovest is sick." Lord, pity him, comfort him, abate his distemper, and relieve him from it, if it be thy will: if not, grant him thy gracious presence and safe conduct through the Jordan of death, and a happy landing in the Canaan of glory.

We are told, that the prayers of the righteous, in such cases, avail much, James v. 16, and this, to encourage us to pray one for another. Whatever be the sick person's condition, such confessions and petitions as these following may be made use of in prayer for him.

PETITIONS FOR THE SICK.

LORD, thou first breathedst into man the breath of life; and when thou takest away that breath, he dies, and returns again to his dust. May we be duly sensible of our dependence on thee for all that we enjoy. We acknowledge, that our great abuse of the many days of health and welfare thou affordest us justly deserves the visitation of sickness and diseases. Woe is us, we lie down under a burden of sin, both original and actual; we are all children of wrath by nature, and under the curse of a broken law: and all other miseries, temporal and spiritual, distempers, pains, death, and hell itself, are the issue thereof. Be merciful to the sick person under thy hand; discover to him his sins, and the cause why thou contendest with him. Make him to see that he is lost in himself, and wholly unable to satisfy the demands of offended justice; and do thou reveal Christ to his soul for righteousness and life. O give him thy Holy Spirit to create and strengthen faith, that he may lay hold of Christ as offered in the gospel; work in him the grace of true repentance. Enable him to search his heart and try his ways, so as he may discover every accursed thing, every Achan in the camp, that hath provoked the Lord against him. When thou puttest him in the furnace, be pleased to stand by, and oversee the metal while it is melting in it. Try him as silver is tried, and bring him out purified, and let him lose nothing in this furnace but his dross. Remove his sins from thy presence, as far as east is from the west, that they may never trouble his conscience, nor rise in judgment against his soul. However bitter the cup may be, let it be medicinal to cure all the diseases of his soul. O that these afflictions, which are but for a moment, may work for him a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory through Jesus Christ the purchaser!

Look down from heaven, the habitation of thy holiness, behold his affliction and his pain, and forgive all his sin. Shew such pity to him as a father doth to his child, and lay no more upon him than he is able to bear. Lord, give patience and strength answerable to the burden of trouble thou hast laid upon him. In time of his weakness uphold him with thy strength. Relieve his wants out of thy infinite fulness. Lord, thou knowest his frame, and rememberest that he is dust; save him from extremity of trouble, either abate his pain, or increase his patience to endure what thou measurest out to him. Give him the evidences of all the graces of thy Spirit. Arm and defend him against all the suggestions and temptations of Satan. Take his heart wholly off the world, and set his affections on things above. Lord, make use of this chastisement of his body as a medicine to cure his soul, by drawing his soul, that is sick of sin, to thyself. O enable him in a penitent believing manner to come by repentance to Christ, his soul physician, to get it healed of all its maladies. Sanctify his sickness, and let the fruit of it be to purge away his sin.

If God shall be pleased to add to his days, bless all means of his recovery. Remove the disease; renew his strength, both outward and inward; heal his soul as well as his body. And enable him to walk tenderly before God, and carefully to remember and perform such vows and promises of obedience as men are apt to make in time of sickness.

If God hath determined to finish his days by the present visitation; let him find such evidence of the pardon of his sins, of his interest in Christ, and eternal life, as may cause his inward man to be renewed, while his outward man decayeth; that he may meet death without fear, cast himself wholly on Christ without doubting, and desire to be dissolved, that he may for ever be with Jesus Christ. Lord, make his last works better than his first, and the day of his death better than the day of his birth. Make his last words his best words, his last thoughts his best thoughts, and his last hour his best hour. O let him die the death of the righteous, and let his last end be like his. Let the eyes of his soul be opened to see his sins and his Saviour, before the eyes of his body be shut in death. Take away the sting of death, the guilt of sin, that he may walk through the valley of the shadow of death, and fear no evil. Open thou his lips, that his mouth may show forth thy praise, before he go to the place of silence. And when his strength fails, and his tongue is not able to utter words, let the blood of Christ speak for him in heaven. And let thy Holy Spirit within him, make requests for him with sighs and groans that cannot be uttered. When the sight of his eyes fails him, let the eyes of his faith be strengthened, that his soul, with Stephen at his death, may behold Jesus Christ in heaven ready to receive him. Lord, stand by him in his last conflict with his enemies, Satan and death, that he may overcome both, and be more than a conqueror through Christ that hath loved him. Into thy hands we commend his spirit.

Lord, teach us, who survive, by this and other like daily spectacles of our mortality, to see how frail and uncertain our condition is, and so to number our days, that we may seriously apply our hearts to heavenly wisdom through Jesus Christ. Amen.

DIRECT. V.—BE CAREFUL TO FURNISH YOUR FRIENDS WITH SUITABLE COMPANY, AND SPIRITUAL CONVERSE, WHEN THEY ARE SICK OR DYING.

As worldly company and converse are great hindrances, so spiritual company and converse are special helps to the sick and dying. Now, that the friends of the sick may prevent the one, and provide for the other, let the following advices be remembered.

1. Mind your friends timeously to make their wills, and dispatch the settlement of their worldly affairs, that so they may not be disturbed at the last, nor any wise diverted from their main work, by thoughts or discourse about the world. A mind abstracted from the world is a most suitable disposition for a dying man. You cannot carry the things of this world with you when you go hence; and it is not fit you should carry the thoughts of them.

2. Keep carnal company from them as much as possible, and all those that would divert them by idle or worldly discourse. It is both impertinent and cruel, to throw in such impediments in the way of those that are going speedily to their endless state.

3. Do what you can to get faithful ministers and godly Christians to be much about them, who are fit to instruct and counsel them about their souls' matters, and also to pray with them and for them.

4. Be often minding your sick friends of their chief work, and those things which belong unto their peace. Whatever be their state, whether gracious or graceless, it is proper to be minding them, (1.) Of the vanity and emptiness of the world, that can neither give ease to the body, nor comfort to the soul, when either of them is in trouble. 2. Of the sinfulness of sin, which is the spring of all diseases and miseries whatsoever. 3. Of the preciousness and usefulness of Christ to a sinner in all cases, and especially at a dying hour. 4. Of the inexpressible felicity of believers in Christ after death, &c.

Lastly, If you think yourselves not able to instruct or advise your sick friends as they stand in need, then read some good book to them, that may be suitable to the condition of their souls; and, if you have not a fitter at hand, read some chapters or directions of this book to them, as you may see most proper for them. But, above all books, read to the sick the holy scriptures, and some particular chapters and psalms there; such as Gen. xlviii.—l.; Deut. xxxiv.; 1 Kings xvii.; 2 Kings ii.; Job xiv. xix.; Psal. vi. xxiii. xxv. xxx. xxxviii. xli. xlii. xlix. li. lxxi. lxxiii. lxxvii. lxxxviii. lxxxix. xc. ciii. cxvi. cxviii. cxxx. cxlii. cxliii., &c.; Eccl. xii. Isa. xxxviii. liii. liv. lv.; Luke xxii. xxiii. xxiv.; John xiv. xv. xvi. xvii. xx.; Rom. viii.; 1 Cor. xv.; 2 Cor. v.; 1 Thes. iv.; Heb. xi. xii.; Rev. xx. xxi. xxii., and the like.

DIRECT. VI.—BE LIKEWISE SUITABLY CONCERNED FOR THE BODIES OF YOUR FRIENDS, WHEN THEY ARE SICK.

If you would evidence a suitable concern for them, then you must deal tenderly and compassionately with them in their sickness, bear with their impatience and fretting, weary not of them, nor grudge of the trouble they put you to; for shortly you yourselves may be in the like case, when you shall be as great a trouble to others, as your friends are now to you.

Again, it is necessary to employ physicians, and use the best means for the recovery of your friends' health. The means indeed must not be trusted to instead of God, but used in suberviency to him, who hath appointed them, and can only give success to them. We must beware of Asa's sin that sought to the physicians, and not to the Lord. Let us neither take food nor physie without prayer to God for his blessing thereupon.

DIRECT. VII.—WHEN THE SICKNESS OF YOUR RELATIONS OR NEIGHBOURS ISSUES IN DEATH, STUDY A CHRISTIAN AND SUITABLE BEHAVIOUR UNDER SUCH A DISPENSATION.

WHEN a parent loseth a promising child, or a child loseth a loving parent, or when death deprives us of any near relation, it is a speaking and trying providence; and we have much need of grace and counsel from God to carry aright under it. Let us observe these advices,

I. It is necessary, in such a case, that we have a tender sense and feeling of God's afflicting hand. There are two extremes which we must equally avoid; viz., to make light of the death of relations, and to be excessively grieved on that account. God will have us neither to despise his rod, nor faint under it, Heb. xii. 5. God is displeased with those that are stupid and insensible under such afflictions. Why? They despise his rod, and make light of his corrections. Hence he complains of these, Jer. v. 3, "I have smitten them, but they have not grieved." God will have us to feel his hand, to inquire into the meaning of the rod, and search for those sins that have provoked God to smite us. It is a sin of a naughty, selfish, and unchristian spirit, to be unconcerned for the death of friends; and much more is it so in those children who have a secret satisfaction in the death of parents, because of the worldly riches or liberty which they get thereby. God useth to follow this wicked temper with his heavy judgments even in this life.

II. Consider that God is calling you, by the death of others, to keep up lively and lasting impressions of death and eternity upon your spirits. God knoweth how advantageous it would be for men so to do; and therefore he sets frequent spectacles of mortality before their eyes for this end. But such is the corruption and earthliness of our minds, that we soon forget the thoughts of death. When we see our friends in the pangs of death, or laid in the grave, it strikes us with some fear and concern, to think that one day this will be our own case: but no sooner is the dead interred, and the grave filled up again, than all these serious thoughts begin to vanish, and men return to their sins and pleasures as before. Ah! what folly is this! should not men always keep alive the serious thoughts of death and a future state? Are we not always alike mortal? Are we not as liable to death's arrest at other times as when examples are before our eyes?

III. When God takes away your children or relations, let it draw your heart and affections more toward God and things above. As when a shepherd taketh up in his arm a lamb of the flock, the ewe followeth him of her own accord, and will not leave him; so, when the great Shepherd of the sheep taketh a child or friend from you, it should cause you to follow after him, and desire to be with him. But one may say, that is not the ease with me; I fear the wolf hath got the strayed sheep, and devoured it. Then even that suspicion should make you run to the good Shepherd, abide with him, and keep close by the footsteps of the flock, and beware of straying in those paths wherein destroyers go. When God taketh from you those relations whom you dearly loved, he calls you to take your love off the fading creatures, and to set it on the eternal Creator: when the weak branch is taken off, then clasp to the body of the tree, which will not fail you.

IV. In such trials, study a humble and patient submission to the will of God, who in his sovereign wisdom and pleasure hath taken your child or friend from you. Remember who hath done it, even he who gives all men their lives, and hath the absolute power and right to dispose of men's lives as he thinks best. If your fellow-creature do any thing that displeaseth you, you may both ask who did it, and why he did so? But when God doth any thing to you, you must remember he is the potter and you are the clay; and that he may make or mar his clay vessels; yea, break them in pieces at his pleasure; "and there is none that can stay his hand, or say to him, What dost thou? be still, and know that I am God," Psal. xli. 10. The master of a family gathers at pleasure the flowers and fruits of his gardens; sometimes he cuts off the buds, sometimes he suffers them to blossom; sometimes he gathers the green fruits, sometimes he stays till it be ripe; and every body thinks he may do with his own what he pleaseth; and shall not the almighty God have liberty much more to dispose of all that grows in his own territories at his pleasure? The master of the family hath not created the trees and plants of his garden; but God hath made and fashioned all the children of men with his almighty hand.

It is the sense of this sovereign right and dominion of God over his creatures, that hath made his people to be silent under the greatest losses. Hence Aaron, when he lost his two sons by a sudden and extraordinary stroke, it is said of him, Lev. x. 3, "And Aaron held his peace." He opened not his mouth, because it was a sovereign God that did it. So holy Job, when he lost all his children by one blow, patiently submits to his absolute Lord, Job i. 21, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." Job knew that God's relation to them was far nearer than his, and his right to dispose of them was indisputable. It was a holy and excellent speech of that honourable person Lord Duplessis, at the death of his only son; "I could not have borne this from a man, but I can from God."

V. Guard against immoderate grief and excessive sorrow for the death of children or near relations; for this is sinful and offensive to God. Now, grief is sinful and immoderate, when it makes you grudge at God's dispensation, murmur at his will, turn unthankful to him for the mercies you enjoy, overlook all bypast favours, and lament a temporal more than a spiritual loss. Alas! there are many who can bewail a dead friend far more than a dead heart, and the loss of a child more than the loss of God's countenance. Now for preventing this excessive sorrow, consider these things.

1. If you be Christless and impenitent, you have reason to bless God that the stroke was not at your own life, for then you had been eternally miserable and without hope. What is the temporal loss of a child, to the eternal loss of your own soul? O it is far better to be childless and friendless on earth, than to be hopeless and remediless in hell.

2. Consider how little ground you have to complain of any loss or stroke you meet with on earth. (1.) If you eye God's sovereignty and power over you, you have cause to be thankful that he hath not annihilated you and your relations both long ere now, seeing he hath as full a dominion to reduce you to nothing, as to bring you from nothing. Though God should dash us against the walls, as a potter doth his vessel, no man could have reason to say, What dost thou; or, Why dost thou use me so? Jer. xviii. 6, "O house of Israel, cannot I do with you as this potter? saith the Lord." Nay, he hath a greater right to deal so with us, than a potter with his vessel, for God hath contributed all to his creature that it hath, but the potter never made the clay which is the substance of the vessel, nor the water that is needful to make it tractable. All that the potter doth is only to mould the clay into such a shape; besides, the potter's body is no better than the clay he makes his vessel of; nay, perhaps that very clay might have been some part of the body of a man as good as the potter himself. Now, shall the potter have such absolute power over that which is so near and like to him, and shall not God have it over that which is infinitely distant from him? That word, Dan. iv. 34, 35, The Most High doth according to his will," is enough to silence the murmurings of all men under strokes and losses, however long continued or severe.

(2.) If you eye the hand of God as most just and righteous in what you have met with, you have no ground to complain. Have you not procured all this to yourself? Is not God most just in all that hath come upon you? Nay, if you consider your sins, and God's absolute dominion over you, you must own he might have dealt with you in a smarter manner than he hath done; instead of one affliction you might have had a thousand.

(3.) Look to the mercy that is mixed with the rod. It is a wonder that this great Sovereign, who is so provoked by us, should allow us any mercy at all, and yet we receive innumerable benefits from him. Whatever be our afflictions, surely they are far less than our iniquities deserve. Hath he cast your child into the grave? He might justly have thrown your soul into hell. It is of the Lord's mercy you are not consumed. Why should a living man complain? A man out of a grave, and out of hell likewise, hath surely no reason.

(4.) If you compare your affliction with the trials of others of God's people; yea, and those saints who have been most eminent, you have no reason to grudge at your loss. You have one child dead, but Aaron, who is called the saint of the Lord, Psal. cvi. 16, had two at a stroke; nay, Job, whom God commends above all the saints in his day, had all his children slain by one blow, and both these eminent saints had these losses by an immediate and extraordinary stroke from God. Some godly parents have seen their children live to prove scandals to religion, and a grief of mind to themselves, and would have thought it a mercy if God had taken them away when young. Say not then, that there is no sorrow like your sorrow; for the cup which many others have drunk, hath had more bitter ingredients in it than yours.

3. Consider that excessive grief cannot better your case, it may well make it worse. If you struggle and contend under God's hand, you act a foolish part; as a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke, that by his struggling galls his neck, and makes the yoke the more uneasy; or like a bird fluttering in a net, that, instead of freeing, the more entangles itself. Thus, by immoderate sorrow and fretting under the stroke, you sin the more against God, and make your burden the more heavy.

4. Remember the transactions of thy soul with God, in the day thou enteredst into covenant with him. When thou sawest thyself on the brink of hell, and a burden of sin pressing thee down, and no hope for thee but in Christ; then your cry was, "None but Christ; take children, take relations, riches, and all things in the world from me, and give me Christ. I give up myself, and all I have, to be disposed at thy pleasure; thy will, Lord, shall be my will," &c. Now God is taking thee at thy word, and trying thy sincerity in what thou said and professed to him so solemnly. He hath disposed of thy dear relation as pleased him: O believer, dost thou rue the bargain? Wouldst thou take thy word again? Where is thy covenanted submission to the will of God, and thy promised contentment with all his disposals?

5. Dost thou not believe that a covenanted God is better to thee than all the friends in the world? Cannot God soon make up the greatest loss to thee, if thou turn to him by prayer, and pour out thy heart and sorrows in his bosom? What are the world's comforts to God's comforts? A smile of God's face in prayer can soon sweeten the bitter cup, and make thee forget all thy sorrows, Psal. xciv. 19, "In the multitude of my thoughts within me, thy comforts delight my soul." The author of the fulfilling of the scriptures, tells us of one Patrick Mackilwrae, an eminent saint in the west of Scotland, who having lost his dear and only son, got to his closet, and there poured out his soul freely to the Lord. When he came out to his friends at length, who were waiting to comfort him, and fearing how he would take such a heavy stroke, he returned from prayer with a cheerful countenance, and told some of his friends, who asked him the reason of his cheerfulness, "That he had got that in his retirement with the Lord, that, to have it afterwards renewed, he would be content to lose a son every day."

6. Seriously consider that you are but a few days' journey behind him for whom you mourn, and that you will quickly overtake him, and be with him again. This allayed David's sorrow for his child, 2 Sam. xii. 23, "I shall go to him." It is our expecting to live long here, to enjoy the comfort of relations, that commonly makes us grieve so much for their death; for, if we looked on ourselves as men that were to die in a few days, we would not be so much troubled for our friends, that are gone but a little space before us.

7. If your friends are gone to heaven, you have more reason to rejoice with them than to mourn for them; seeing they are unspeakably happier where they now are, than they could have been with you. It is the most fervent desire and wish of every true Christian to be in heaven; and, will you grieve because God hath taken your relation thither, where you desire to be yourself above all things? As Christ said to his disciples before his death, John xiv. 28, "If ye loved me, ye would rejoice, because I go unto the Father." So, if your departed friend could speak to you from heaven, he would say, "If you loved me with a pure spiritual love, you would rejoice that I am gone to my Father, where I am more happy than you can possibly conceive of me."

Object. "Had I ground to think that my friend is gone to heaven, it would ease me; but, alas, I fear it is otherwise."

Ans. 1. It doth not belong to us to dive into the eternal state and condition of those that are gone off the stage. These secret things belong to God, who exerciseth his mercy or justice toward sinners according to his sovereign will.

2. Supposing the worst, you ought to submit to the incontrollable sovereignty of God, who hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. He is of one mind, and who can turn him? The Lord cut off Aaron's two sons in the very act of sin and rebellion against him, and yet Aaron held his peace, and so ought you.

3. Whatever be the lot of others hereafter, you have reason to be thankful to God for his distinguishing mercy, in saving you from those flames that others fall into, and giving you good hope through grace of glorifying God above for ever.

DIRECT. VIII.—LET THE SICKNESS AND DEATH OF OTHERS BE A WARNING TO YOU IN TIME OF HEALTH, TO MAKE DUE PREPARATION FOR THE TIME OF SICKNESS AND OF DYING, WHICH IS BEFORE YOUR HAND.

WHEN you see your friends and neighbours in a sickly, weak, or dying condition, the language of the dispensation to you that are in health is, Prepare for sickness also. Nay, the feeble voice of the sick proclaims this warning as loudly, as if they should lift up their voice like a trumpet, and say to you, "Remember that you must lie in the same case ere long, you must also groan under pain, lose your strength and beauty, leave your mirth and company, bid adieu to all the world, and look out for the grim messenger death, that is coming to dissolve the earthly tabernacle, send the body to lie in a putrifying grave, and the soul to stand before God's tribunal, to be sentenced to an endless state. This will be thy case, O young man, strong man, healthful man, as really in a little, as it is of those now before your eyes. O how soon will it come!—What thoughts will you then have of this world, of sin, and vain company? Will any thing comfort you then, but the favour of God, the love of Christ, and the review of a holy well spent life? wherefore do with all thy might now what thy hand finds to do: employ the time of health well in preparing for sickness, and leave nothing to do in time of sickness, which is a most unfit season for a man to do soul-work and salvation-work in.

1. I shall begin with those of the family where the harbinger of death presently resides. Surely the warnings of sickness and death ought to be louder in your ears than others, and most diligently hearkened unto by you, that lodge under the same roof with the messengers of the king of terrors. 1. Remember that word, 1 Pet. v. 6, "Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God." It well becomes guilty sinners, all the members of the family, to be humble before a holy God, when he is smiting any of the number. Humbly acknowledge his sovereignty and absolute dominion over you, saying, "Lord, thou art the author and founder of families, and thou mayest afflict and punish them as thou thinkest fit. Thou settest the solitary in families, and multiplieth their number; and thou mayest diminish them, yea, lay them desolate according to thy pleasure. Thou mightest have made all the members of the family sick, as well as one; thou mightest have given a deadly blow to parents, children, and servants at once; yea, have made the house in which we live a common grave, and buried us all together in its ruins." Humbly acknowledge the justice and mercy of God in the present visitation. "Lord, instead of one, we all deserved to have been thrown on sick-beds, and all of us to have been smitten by death. Thou punishest us less than our iniquities deserve." Acknowledge also God's wisdom and love in the present affliction, and humbly submit to take the cup which he hath mingled for you. The cup which our heavenly Father hath ordered for his family, shall we not drink it? It is a gracious and wise God that doth what is done in the family; therefore it is our part to be dumb, and not to open our mouth to quarrel it.

2. The command which the king of Nineveh gave to all his subjects, when threatened with ruin, Jonah iii. 8, is very proper for a master of a family to give to all under his charge, when sickness rages among them: "Fast, and cry mightily to God, and turn every one from his evil way:—who can tell if God will turn away from his fierce anger, that we perish not?" When the destroying angel gets a commission to smite families with mortal and infectious diseases, which sometimes go from house to house like a plague, sweeping many old and young off the stage; then especially it should be a time of mighty crying and pleading with God for mercy. And, since our pleading is wholly ineffectual, without an atoning sacrifice to incensed justice, let us not forget to bring the all-sufficient sacrifice of Christ's blood along with us, and plead this with God for averting his wrath from our houses and families. As Moses said to Aaron, in a time of common calamity, Num. xiv. 46, so may I say to you that are heads of families, "Take a censer and incense, and go quickly and make an atonement for them; for there is wrath gone out from the Lord, the plague is begun." Bring the incense of Christ's satisfaction, that great atonement to divine justice, which was typified by the legal sacrifices and oblations. Humbly and earnestly plead that great sacrifice with God, for turning away the fierceness of his wrath. Get the bunch of hyssop, faith, in order to the sprinkling of your houses with that atoning blood, that so you and your families may be among the preserved in Christ Jesus.

Lastly, Let all in the family where sickness is, and especially the head of it, remember that word, Job xxii. 23, "Thou shalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacles." God hath sent sickness with this message to you, "Search out family sins, whether of omission or commission; mourn over them, turn from them, banish them far away. Let no vice lodge under your roof. Let family-worship be no more neglected, nor slightly performed. Let God have both the morning and evening sacrifice." Now, if the members of those families visited with sickness, who are in health for the present, would thus humble themselves, cry to God, plead the blood of Christ, and reform what is amiss among them; the present affliction would be sanctified, and they in some measure prepared for the like trial, when God shall be pleased to put the cup in their hands.

II. In the next place, let me warn all the friends and neighbours of the sick, whether they be of the family or not, to improve the day of health, in making ready for the time of sickness. Be much in the exercise of self-examination, humiliation for sin, believing in Christ, renewing covenant with God, mortifying of sin, trimming the lamp, meditating of heaven, living by faith, deniedness to the world, studying to overcome the love of life and fears of death. Concerning all which I have given directions in the foregoing chapters of this book, when speaking to the sick and distressed. These exercises are not only proper for the sick, but also for those in health; and are suitable preparations for sickness and death, and to be studied by all men in every condition. But there are some things further most necessary to be minded by people in time of their health, in order to prepare them for the time of sickness and of dying, before it come.

1. Make your latter will, and keep it by you, that you may not be incumbered with your worldly affairs, in time of sickness, or at a dying hour. Surely it is great wisdom to put this work by hand in time of health. But I have spoken largely of this in Chap. I. Direct. VI.

2. Take heed in time of health, that you lay not up sad provision against the day of sickness, by your careless and untender walk. As it is sin that brings on sickness upon us, so it is sin that imbitters it unto us. O beware of all known sin, and particularly the sins of earthly-mindedness, unthankfulness for mercies, lukewarmness in religion, neglecting to improve Christ, neglect of prayer, and formality in it, quenching of the Spirit, falling from your first love, breach of vows, miscarrying under signal mercies, sinning after afflictions, returning to old sins. Guard against these evils now in the time of health, otherwise they will put thorns in your pillow where sickness cometh. Dare not to live in such a course as you would not adventure to die in. How do you know but your next step may be into the grave? and would you be willing to lie down there in your sins, with earthly, dead, formal, wandering, and unbelieving hearts?

3. Sit loose from the world, and live as strangers in it, that you may be able to pack up and be gone from it upon short warning. Let death find you dead before hand, dead to the world. If your affections be glued to the world, it will be a violent rending and sad parting you will have with it when the dying hour cometh. You will be ready, like Lot's wife, to linger, hanker, and look greedily back again.

4. Keep short reckoning with God and conscience, that you may not have old scores to reckon upon when you come to the death-bed. O what stinging, pain, and torment may one sin unmourned for cost you at that time! let conscience then bring in the accounts of every day before you sleep, and speedily make up every controversy that may fall out between God and thy soul.

5. Dwell much upon the thoughts of death, that you may learn to be acquainted and familiar with it, as Job was, who said, before-hand, "to corruption, Thou art my father; and to the worm, thou art my mother and my sister," Job xvii. 14. For this cause the Egyptians used to place a dead man's scull in some conspicuous place of their rooms; likewise the Jews had their sepulchres in their gardens of pleasure, that so in the midst of their delights they might think on their dying time. We read of Philip, king of Macedon, that ordered a page to rouse him from sleep every morning with these words: "O king, remember that thou art a mortal man." By this often repeated lesson he laboured to humble his lofty mind, and make his acquaintance with death, that it might not seem strange or surprising to him, when it should actually come and snatch him away.

6. Study to spend every day as it were to be your last, and perform every duty as it were the last, still looking on sickness and death as very near. That which makes most men so unconcerned about sickness, death, and eternity, is, they view them as things afar off, at thirty or forty years' distance. "They think their time will be long here. Why? They are healthy, of a strong constitution, and their fathers lived so long; which surely are false rules to judge by." It was the expectation of many years that helped on the ruin of that rich fool in the gospel. It were far better for every man to look on himself as standing every day and night at the very door of eternity, and hundreds of diseases ready to open the door to let him in. When you lie down at night, leave your heart with Christ, and compose your spirit so, as if you were not to awake till the heavens were no more; for certainly that night cometh, of which you will never see the morning, or that morning of which you will never see the night. But which of your mornings or nights these will be, you know not, seeing your times are not in your own hands.

7. Set apart some time daily for thinking in a retired way on your time that is past, and upon eternity that is to come. The neglect of this duty of meditation and retired thinking, is very prejudicial both to the godly and ungodly. It was David's practice to think, and to think upon his ways; which engaged him to reform whatever he found amiss in them, Psal. cxix. 59. O! it is the ruin of many a soul, that they are utter strangers to this way of thinking. I have read of a father, who on his death-bed, left it as a solemn charge upon his only son, who was a prodigal, that he should spend a quarter of an hour every day in retired thinking, and let him choose any subject he pleased. The son thinks this an easy task, undertakes it, and after his father's death set himself to perform his promise: one day he thinks upon his by-past pleasures: another day he contrives his future delights; after a while he begins to think seriously what might be his father's design in laying this task upon him: at length, he thinks his father was a wise and good man, and therefore he surely intended and hoped, that, among the rest of his meditations, he would some time or other think of religion. When this had truly possessed his thoughts, one thought and question comes upon the back of another, about his by-past life and future state, that he could not contain himself in so short a confinement, but was that night without sleep; yea, and afterwards could have no rest till he became seriously religious. O that I could persuade all careless and unthinking souls to go and do likewise! Ah, how many spend their days in a continual hurry about worldly affairs, and perish for want of thinking!

8. Among other subjects of your retired thoughts, spend some time in thinking how awful and terrible a thing it must be for a poor Christless soul to make its appearance before an angry God after death: for who, said the prophet, can dwell with devouring fire? Who can abide with everlasting burnings? I have read of a certain king of Hungary, who being on a time marvelously sad and heavy, his brother, who was a brisk and gallant man, would needs know the reason: "O brother," said he, "I have been a great sinner against God, and I know not how I shall appear before his judgment seat." His brother answered, "These are but melancholy thoughts;"

and so made light of them, as most courtiers use to do. The king replied nothing at that time; but the custom of that country was, the government being absolute, if the executioner sounded a trumpet at a man's door, he was presently to be led to execution. The king sent the executioner in the dead of night, and caused him to sound his trumpet before his brother's door, who hearing and seeing the messenger of death, sprang in trembling into his brother's presence, falls down upon his knees, and beseeches the king to let him know wherein he had offended him. "O brother," said the king, "you never offended me, but loved me; but is the sight of an earthly executioner so terrible to thee; and, shall not I, who am so great a sinner, fear much more to be brought to the judgment-seat of an angry God?"

9. Think often how religiously men use to wish they had lived when they come to the sick and dying time. Those who have spent their time most carelessly, begin to have other notions of religion when they see the grim messenger approaching. Go to their bed-sides and ask them, Whether sloth or diligence, formality or fervency, drinking or prayer, loving the world or loving Christ, be the best; would they not tell you, that there are none so wise as they that are most religious? Think, O man in health, with thyself, if thou wast just now upon thy death-bed, and sawest thy friends standing mourning round about thee, but unable to help thee, what would be thy thoughts and discourse at that time? O then, let some of the same thoughts and discourses fill up every day and hour of thy life now. Why? Thou knowest not but this moment thou mayest be as near death as if thy friends and physicians likewise were despairing of thy life, and had given you over for dead.

10. Be employed now in fighting the good fight of faith. You have many enemies to deal with, and death is the last of them. Would you obtain the victory over them? Then get on the Christian armour, and make much use of the shield of faith. We read in the book of Esther, that king Ahasuerus would not recal the proclamation he had emitted against the Jews; but he gave them full liberty to take up arms to defend themselves, and attack their enemies: so here, God will not recal the sentence of death he hath passed on all men in the garden; but nevertheless he allows, yea, commissionates all true Israelites to take up arms against death, to conquer and trample it under foot by faith.

Lastly, Be diligent now in health, providing and laying up a stock against the time of sickness and affliction; which may contribute to your comfortable living then when the world's good things will be tasteless and comfortless to you. As they who have a voyage to go, victual the ship, and those who have a siege to hold out, take in provision; even so do you.

1. Get a stock of grace against that time, especially a stock of faith, of patience, of humility, self-denial, &c. There will be use for all these then. A little grace, or a little faith, is not enough; for this will faint under great afflictions. We read, Mat. xiv., that, when the winds began to blow fiercely, Peter's little faith began to fail. You have need of a great measure of patience against that time, that you may wait patiently on God till he come to your relief. You know not but he may lengthen out your trials, and tarry till the fourth watch of the night before he come with deliverance.

2. Provide a stock of evidences or marks of grace, and of the love of God, that you may be able to assert your interest in him as your portion in Christ, and may be persuaded that neither death nor life will ever separate you from him.

3. Get a stock of divine experiences. Lay up all the experiences you have had of God's loving-kindness, and these will give greater relief and encouragement to the soul in the day of distress.

4. Lay up a stock of sermons. Treasure up the counsels and cordials which they bring you from God's word, that so you may, according to Isa. xlii. 23, "hear for the time to come;" and especially for sick-beds, when you cannot get sermons to hear. Then it is that you ought to live and feed upon the sermons you have heard.

5. Lay up a stock of prayers. Be much in wrestling with God for help and thorough-bearing in the day of affliction; and so you may expect the gracious returns thereof in the day of calamity.

6. Provide a stock of promises. Be now gathering these sweet cordials from God's word, lay them up in your heart and memory, and they will be very refreshing and supporting to you in the day of affliction.

DIRECT. IX.—LET THOSE WHO ARE IN HEALTH SET ABOUT THE WORK OF REPENTANCE, AND TURNING TO GOD IN CHRIST TIMEOUSLY AND QUICKLY: AND BEWARE OF DELAYING THIS WORK UNTIL THE TIME OF SICKNESS AND DYING.

God's command to you is, to set about the work presently without any delay, Heb. iii. 15, "To-day if you will hear his voice, harden not your hearts." Mat. xxi. 28, "Go work to-day in my vineyard." Eccl. xii. 1, "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth." Well, God's voice to you, O man in health, is to-day. But the devil's voice is to-morrow. And which of the two will you hearken to? Surely it is your wisdom to obey the voice of your Creator and Friend, and not of your enemy and destroyer. Why? To-day thou art in health, to-morrow thou mayest be in sickness; to-day thou art on earth, to-morrow thou mayest be in hell; to-day Christ is inviting you to come to him, to-morrow he may be sentencing you to depart from him. And consider, that the devil, who tempts you to delay this day, will be as ready to tempt you to the same to-morrow; and so the devil's to-morrow will never come. It will still be to-morrow with him till the last hour, that so he may get you beguiled out of your whole time and salvation together.

Here I shall endeavour two things; I. Bring arguments to persuade you to repent and close with the offers of Christ presently, without any delay, as God requires. II. Show the evil and danger of delaying till the time of sickness and of dying. As to the first, viz., arguments for present repentance, and against delaying the work:

I. Consider the uncertainty of your life and time to repent. Your life is but a vapour, a little warm breath that is going out and in at your nostrils, which may be stopped by death ere you be aware; thou knowest not what will be to-morrow, Prov. xxvii. 1. It was the saying of a godly man, when invited to a feast upon the morrow, "I have not had a morrow for these many years." It was a bad use these Epicureans made of this uncertainty, Isa. xxii. 133, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we shall die." It is much wiser to say, Let us pray and turn to the Lord, for to-morrow we shall die. Nay, you have no security for one hour to repent in; for God hath a thousand diseases and accidents ready to stop your breath and end your days, whenever he pleaseth to give them orders. There are many secure sinners, who presume on long life, but there are none nearer to destruction than such; for God loves to disappoint those that promise themselves a long life in sin and impenitency, as he did that rich man who was laying up for many years, Luke xii. 19, "This night shall thy soul be required of thee." And O what a dark and dismal night will it be, if death comes before thy repentance! O man, thou never didst lie down one night with assurance of rising again; thou never didst draw one breath with assurance of drawing another. What madness is it then to delay salvation-work one day or hour longer, and so to leave the weightiest matter in the world at the greatest uncertainty!

2. Consider, that though God, in his wonderful mercy and patience, should prolong your days, yet the longest life is short enough for the work you have to do, suppose you begin it presently. Nay, had you Methusalem's years to spend, they would be no more than sufficient to repent and mourn for the sins and guilt which you have been so long contracting; to perform and amend the many things that have been amiss; to perform all the duties incumbent on you; to make sure your calling and election, and put your souls in a good posture and preparation for an eternal state, and get them made meet to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light. Now, do you think that all this work can be done in an instant, or in a time of sickness or old age, when you are hardly fit to do any thing?—When a man's spirit is unable to bear the infirmities of nature, how will he be able to bear the lashes of a guilty conscience, or a wounded spirit? When the understanding is weak, the memory frail, the will obstinately bent the wrong way, by a long custom of sinning and neglecting of duty; will that be a fit time to begin the work of repentance and conversion to God? When nature is decayed, and the candle of life just sinking in the socket, will you begin then to act for God, and make your light shine before men to his glory? O remember, your work is long, your time is short, and though you begin this very hour, you will have no time to spare.

3. Delay not this work, because it is not in your power to do it when you please. It is a delusion of the devil, to imagine you may repent when you will. No, no; it is God only that giveth repentance, and he gives it when, and to whom he pleaseth, Acts v. 31. And it is a mere peradventure, if ever he give it to a delaying sinner, 2 Tim. ii. 25. When is it that you may have hopes he will give repentance, but when he calls you to it, and prescribes means to be used for that end? Now, that is, to-day. "To-day if ye will hear his voice: now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation." To-day, when God is calling, and the Spirit striving, is the time of finding the Lord, and getting repentance from. To-morrow it may be too late; the Lord's hand may be closed, and the door of mercy shut. If you refuse the Spirit when he strives with you, he may leave you, and never put another serious thought in your heart of turning to the Lord. O defer not seeking repentance till it be too late; for there is a time when the Lord will not be found, and then repentance will not be found, though you seek it with tears. Indeed, God hath promised mercy to penitent sinners; but he hath no where promised the aids of his grace and Spirit to them that put off their repentance: and he hath no where promised acceptance to mere grief and sorrow for sin, without faith and fruits meet for repentance; he hath no where promised to pardon those, who at last promise to leave their sins, when they can keep them no longer.

4. The longer repentance and closing with Christ is delayed, the difficulty thereof is every day increased.—Why? 1. Because of the deceitful nature of sin, which daily bewitches and hardens the heart more and more in the practice of it.

2. Custom in any thing hath a strange influence on us, and becomes a kind of second nature, and breeds an almost invisible inclination to whatsoever we have long addicted ourselves unto, whether it be in action natural or moral. Hence Ovid gives that good advice:

*Sed propera, nec te venturus defer in horas:
Qui non est hodie, cras minus aptus erit.*

"Be speedy; put not off till another time:
He who is not prepared to-day, will be more unprepared to-morrow."

He that goes on from day to day, in sin, will find his indisposition to repent daily increased, the habits of sin strengthened, and himself brought at length under the power of an inveterate custom. And if it be hard to break any custom, much more a custom in sinning, which is so agreeable to depraved nature. Hence, saith the Spirit of God, Jer. xiii. 23, "Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? Then may ye also do good, that are accustomed to do evil." 3. The longer Satan keeps possession, the more difficult will his ejection prove. The devils that possessed the man from the womb up, could not be cast out but by some extraordinary way. 4. Delays bring on spiritual judgments from God, such as judicial hardness on the heart, which will make repentance impossible, according to that terrible place, Isa. vi. 9, 10, "Make the heart of his people fat," &c. Which is quoted no less than six times in the New Testament, as if it belonged only to them that lingered and sit impenitent under the calls of the gospel.

Lastly, We would reckon such delays madness in earthly affairs, which are but trifles when compared to salvation-work. If a man's house were on fire we would count him mad, if he would say, It is time enough to quench it to-morrow: or if he were stung with a venomous serpent, he would be mad that neglected to seek a present cure: or, if he had got poison in his stomach, he would never think he could soon enough vomit it up. If a malefactor were condemned to a cruel death to-morrow, but had a promise of a remission, if he should look after it to-day; would he be so foolish as delay it till next morning? But how much greater madness is it to delay repenting and fleeing to Christ, when God's calls and promises relate to the present time, and our danger in delaying is infinitely greater than in any of the foresaid cases? Surely there is no sting so dangerous, no poison so deadly as sin; and can we too soon seek after the balm of Gilead, the blood of Christ for its cure? There is no death like the second death, no fire so dreadful as the eternal fire of God's wrath; now this fire is already kindled against your souls; and if it be not timeously quenched, it will burn to the lowest hell. Lose no time to get it extinguished, by fleeing to the blood of Jesus.

II. The next thing is to show the evil and danger of delaying this work till the time of sickness and dying. Alas, it is the common practice of the most part! But consider, 1. What wretched ingratitude and baseness there is in it. Whether is it fit that you should give the best of your time to God that made you, or to the devil that seeks your destruction? Is it reasonable that the devil should feast on the flower and prime of your youth and strength, and your Creator have no other but the fragments of the devil's table? When the dregs of your time are come, your strength gone, your senses failed, your understanding and memory weak, your affections spent upon the creature, yea, when you are good for nothing else; will you be so base as think you are then good enough for God, and for salvation-work, which requires all your strength and might? But remember, if you be so base as to reserve the dregs of your time for God, you may expect he will be so just as to reserve the dregs of his wrath for you, according to that word, Mal. i. 14, "Cursed be the deceiver, which hath in his flock a male, and sacrificeth unto the Lord a corrupt thing." Your youth, strength, health, gifts, talents, are the males of the flock; if you give these to the devil, and reserve the weakness of sickness and old age for God, you draw down his curse upon your heads; and how long will you be able to bear up under the weight of God's curse? Now, O delaying sinners, why should you be so ungrateful to God, and injurious to yourselves? God had early thoughts of mercy to you; and will you have nothing but late thoughts of duty to him; Christ did not defer his dying for us till he was old; and shall we defer living to him, till we be old? O, we do not deal with God as we would have him deal with us. When we need help in trouble, we cry, as Psal. cii. 2, "Lord hear me; in the day when I call, answer me speedily." To-day we still make the season of mercy, but to-morrow the season for duty. When mercy is delayed, we impatiently cry, How long? how long? We will not wait God's holy leisure. But, alas! we would have God to wait our sinful leisure. O let us be ashamed of such disingenuous dealings with our Creator.

2. Death may get a commission to take you off suddenly, without giving you any time to repent. You are not sure to see the evening star of sickness, before the night of death overtake you, or that you will have any warning given you before the fatal stroke. For how many are there who project long lives, and look for time before death to repent, that get a surprising call to remove from the earthly tabernacle, and have not one minute to provide another lodging? How many are drowned by a sudden storm at sea? And how many killed by outward accidents on land? Some drop down suddenly in the streets; some die sitting in their chairs, some go well to bed at night, and never see the morning; some die as quickly by a fit of an epilepsy or apoplexy, as if shot with a gun. Thus thousands are hurried into eternity, and presented before a tribunal, without being allowed so much time as to think one serious thought, or speak one word; not one moment to consider where they are going, or to cry to God for mercy. And how know you but this may be your case at death? Must it not be the greatest folly then, to delay your repentance to a dying time, when your life may not be one minute longer?

3. Though you may have some time to lie on sick-beds, how know you but your sickness may be such as shall incapacitate you for spiritual work? Some we see are so oppressed with continual slumbering and sleeping, even when death is nearest, that they are in no case to think or speak of those things that belong to their eternal state. Others, in high fevers, are troubled with ravings, and have no use of their reason, so that they are not capable to settle their worldly affairs; and how much less are they fit to secure their soul's eternal concerns at that time? Some again, are so racked with extreme pains and agonies, impatient frettings, and bitter uneasiness, that they cannot get one settled thought about their soul's present or future state. Others are so filled with terror and amazement at the view of approaching death and eternity, that they cannot compose their thoughts, to examine themselves, confess their sins, act faith in a Saviour, or follow any direction that is given them; but go off the stage in a confusion, being incapable to do any thing to purpose for their souls. Some, their distemper is such, that they are brought to a great strait between the word of God and the physician. The word of God and his ministers tell them if they do not mourn for their sins, and wrestle for mercy, they cannot be saved: but, saith the physician, if you trouble yourself with sad and melancholy thoughts, you prejudice your body and hazard your life. O! is this a fit time then to begin your preparation for another world?

4. The Spirit of God being long resisted and vexed by many in the day of health, he is provoked to leave them on death-beds to the hardness of their own hearts: and so they remain, like stocks and stones, dead and stupid to the last.

5. The devil, that was busy all your lives to keep you from repentance, will not be idle at this time; nay, he will be more active then than ever to ruin you, either by causing you to split on the rock of presumption or of despair. Sometimes he will tell sinners then, "You need not trouble yourselves about your souls: God is more merciful than to damn you; the repentance you have already, will serve the turn." But if this will not quiet them, he will study to drive them to despair, by telling them, "They have lost the season of repentance and closing with Christ; and now there is no remedy, no hope for them; and it is in vain to use any further means." O then, do not hearken to Satan now, when he tempts you to delay your repentance.

6. Whatever appearance of repentance some dying persons may have, let that be no encouragement to put off till that time. Why, there lieth a just suspicion upon a late repentance, that it is seldom sound and sincere. It is no sound work, that ariseth more from fears of hell, than from any real hatred of sin; more from love to self, than love to God: and it is to be feared, that death-bed repentance is mostly of this sort, seeing ordinarily it consisteth more in grief and fear, prayers and promises, than in a hearty loathing of sin, love to holiness, or willingness to accept of Jesus Christ: for we have not seen many of these penitents, who, in the view of death, have professed great sorrow for their wicked lives, and made solemn promises of amendment; yet when they have happened to recover, all their righteousness hath vanished, and they have returned to their former sins as greedily as ever. And, O delaying sinner, what ground have you to think that your death-bed repentance will be any better than theirs? Be wise then in time, set heartily about salvation-work in the day of your health, and do not leave the weightiest work to the weakest time.

Object. I. "But hath not God promised mercy to them that repent of their sins at any time?"

Ans. Yes, to them that repent truly and sincerely: but do not think that it is in your power to repent so, at any time you please; no, it is impossible you can do it without the influence and assistance of the Spirit of God. And God hath no where promised this to those that put off their repentance to a death-bed. There is a great difference between a sick man's howling upon his bed, and sincere gospel repenting. I grant, true repentance is never too late; but O! late repentance is seldom true. True repentance is that which hath a care to walk holily, or hath work meet for repentance joined with it. Hence repentance is not only called Metanoi, a change of mind; but also Metameleia, an after care. Now for a death-bed repentance, that hath no such holy care or good works, I know no promise in the Bible that annexeth salvation unto it.

Object. II. "Do not we read in Christ's parable of the labourers, Mat. xx., that some were hired and brought into the vineyard at the eleventh hour, and got the same reward with those that were hired at the third and sixth hour?"

Ans. 1. These that were brought in so late, could say for themselves, ver. 6, "that no man had hired them," or had offered to hire them before; they did no sooner hear the gospel-call, and offers of salvation through Christ tendered to them. But O! this will stand you in no stead, who have had many a call and offer made you at the third, sixth, and ninth hour, and have resisted and refused them: you will not have it to say at the eleventh hour, as these had, "No man hath hired us."

2. These men, though they came in but at the eleventh hour, and not being sooner hired, yet they were labourers in the vineyard, and wrought one hour therein faithfully, in obedience to their Lord's command; and so brought forth some fruits meet for repentance, and were accepted. But this is no encouragement to any to expect to be brought in at the twelfth hour, when there is no time to work, nor bring forth any fruit to testify the sincerity of their repentance; we have no promise of acceptance made to such.

Object. III. "The penitent thief on the cross sought mercy from Christ at the last hour, and got it."

Ans. That is a singular instance, and gives no encouragement to delaying sinners. The scriptures contain a history of more than four thousand years, and yet, during all that, we have but one example of a man that truly and sincerely repented when he came to die. And in this man's case there was such an extraordinary conjunction of circumstances, as never happened before, and can never fall out again to the end of the world. This man had the happiness to die close by the newly pierced and bleeding wounds of a crucified Jesus, when he was lifted up from the earth in the height of his love, drawing sinners to salvation; which was a junction that can never have a parallel. Again, the man never had an offer of Christ, nor day of grace before now; he surrendered himself upon the very first call: and his faith in Christ at this time was truly singular and miraculous. He was designed by Heaven to be made a rare monument of the power of Christ's grace, and a special trophy of his victory over the devils and wicked men, at a time when they seemed to triumph over him, as one crucified through weakness.

From all which we may see, that this example was extraordinary, and affords no ground for the presumption of delaying sinners. You may as well cast yourselves into the sea, in hopes of preservation by a whale, from the example of Jonah, as defer repentance now, in hopes of repenting on a death-bed, from the example of the thief on the cross. Besides, your way of sinning differs vastly from his. He was not guilty of presumption as you are; he did not slight Christ's calls and offers in the days of his health, and delay his repenting and closing with Christ, in the hopes of an opportunity for them at the hour of death, as you do. Do you know what God determines concerning presumptuous sinning? You may see it, Num. xv. 28, 30, 31, "And the priest shall make an atonement for the soul that sinneth ignorantly," &c. "But the soul that doth ought presumptuously, whether he be born in the land, or a stranger, the same reproacheth the Lord: and that soul shall be cut off from among his people; because he hath despised the word of the Lord." O presumptuous delaying sinner, let this word of the Lord awaken you to a speedy and present resolution to obey his voice. "Return ye now every one from his evil way, and make your ways and your doings good," Jer. xviii. 11. Now is the accepted time: if ye will hear his voice, it must be to-day. Lord, save us from hardening our hearts. Amen.

PREFACE.

I HAVE published the following sermon, to show to the world my concern for the church of Scotland, and her covenanted reformation, to promote what I can her credit and prosperity, and to testify against what I judge reproachful and prejudicial to her. I have added some things from my papers, which I omitted in the delivery for want of time; and here I shall add some things more, for exonerating and explaining myself more fully upon the said subject.

Seeing it is the power of conscience that obliges me to make this appearance, I beg that no man may think I affect popularity in it, or that I incline to make an appeal to the people about controversies which fall in among ministers: that was never my way; and far less am I for bringing in such debates upon sacramental occasions, which ought to be love feasts among Christians. But, in my humble opinion, it is not an improper occasion for the moderator of a synod, in his sermon at the opening thereof, which is concio ad clerum, to address his brethren concerning the controversies or defections of the time, especially if he see his mother-church in extreme danger thereby; for, what dutiful son can be silent at such a time, seeing it is the proper business of a Synod, both to provide remedies themselves, and to address the General Assembly to do it when they are at a loss?

Object. "It is not proper to handle these before the people."

Ans. 1. This has been the constant practice of moderators at the opening of Synods since our blessed Reformation, as appears from our church histories. 2. Frequently there are as many of the people attending the Synod's meeting, whom we cannot prevent, as are hearing the sermon; and so if this argument hold good, we should not at all open our mouths concerning any of the defections of the time: and we know, silence in watchmen is highly condemned by the word of God.

Object. "Is it not said of a dangerous and declining time, Amos v. 13, 'Therefore the prudent shall keep silence at that time, for it is an evil time.'"

Ans. No doubt some ministers make use of that scripture to prevent trouble to themselves, and it hath been cast up to my thoughts also;

but, in my opinion, that text doth not point at prophets, but other private men, whose private capacity allows them to keep silence when others must speak. For prophets are required to "cry aloud, and not spare;" and those who do not, are called "dumb dogs," Isa. lvi. 10; lviii. 1. I grant, indeed, there is a "time to keep silence, as well as a time to speak," Eccl. iii. 7. And the prudent will wisely observe these times: and even when the time cometh that they are called to speak of faults, the prudent will mind to do it in a decent manner, especially if superiors be concerned. If any think I have not so well observed this rule myself, it is what I cannot help, seeing I have aimed to do it in the best way I could: and I do here further declare, that I am loth to give offence to any man; my sincere design being, not to cast reproach upon any of my brethren, but to avert and prevent the reproach of my mother-church, and to promote her welfare according to my bounden duty.

I never inclined to expose my brethren, but rather to cover their mistakes and speak charitably of every one; for which I have been oftentimes blamed by some: but I had far rather err upon that side than upon the other, seeing I myself am so liable to faults and mistakes. I never loved the character of an incendiary, to blow the coal in smaller differences, or to aggravate the wrong steps of others; but always preferred the character of a peace-maker; to compose matters and reconcile parties as much as possible; in which also I have been blamed, as making too great concessions for that end.

Notwithstanding of all the complaints of defection, I acknowledge there are still in the church many worthy, learned, and pious men, in the ministry, whom I honour, and from whom I would be willing to learn, and whom I pray God may long continue in the church as a bulwark, under God, against the evils of corruption and defection which threaten her; and that he may raise up a young set to fill their room, when they are called off the stage. But at the same time I cannot conceal the dismal apprehensions which many well-wishers of our Zion have of her danger, from the view they have of many of the present young clergy and preachers, who seem to affect a new way of moral preaching and lax management, suited to the taste of many patrons and heritors; greedily snatch at presentations, and concur to get themselves thrust into churches against the inclinations both of the presbyteries and the people immediately concerned; which dangerous course is still continued, notwithstanding of the awful rebukes given by the providence of God to several engaged therein.

Besides what I have said in the sermon, of the evil of this practice of voluntary courting and accepting presentations, without any necessity for it, let me here add, that I look upon it as the main spring of all our present distress: for, as it brought on violent settlements and melancholy divisions in parishes and presbyteries; so it gave rise to the making of these acts by assembly 1732, and assembly 1733, which at present occasion so great uneasiness in this church, and may issue in a most destructive rupture, if God in his merey prevent not. For many years this pernicious practice was bogled at, as contrary to Presbyterian principles, and the interest of the church; till some principal persons in this church, who ought to have been guardians of her peace and liberties, from selfish principles, most ingloriously broke the ice to it, about the year 1727, and by their example and countenance drew many others into it; whence it is easy to see at whose door the miseries of this church are to be laid.

Object. "Our famous Presbyterian ministers in ancient times accepted of presentations, and were settled this way."

Ans. Many are grievously imposed upon by this objection, through their not knowing their different situations from ours: For, 1. Our worthy ancestors were but then reforming, and had never been delivered from the yoke of patronages, under which they groaned: but had they been delivered, as we have been, they would never voluntarily have yielded to the wreathing of that yoke about their necks again, as many of us have done, by courting and accepting of the patrons' presentations, when they were under no necessity from the law to do it.

2. In our ancestors' times no man could have access to a church without the patron's allowance; but, as the law now stands, all among us may be settled without owning patrons at all, if they will have but a little patience: seeing the legislature hath been so indulging as to enact, "That if the patron's presentation be not accepted within six months after the vacancy, the power of planting the church falls into the hands of the presbytery"

3. Our zealous ancestors gave no countenance to patronages, but what they were driven to by their situation with the law; they would not, for mean ends, have gone into voluntary and unnecessary accepting of presentations, as many of us do: but seeing, as the law then stood, there was no access to churches without the patron's allowance, they behoved to submit to settlements in those churches to which the patrons were pleased to present them; and this they did not till they had the consent of the people, and concurrence of the presbyteries concerned.

4. Our reforming ancestors still looked upon patronages as a grievance and bondage, and from time to time applied to the legislature to get it removed, which at length they got done in 1649. But many of us are so far from looking on it as a grievance, that they willfully bring the yoke upon the church, by their officious courting and accepting of presentations, after we were in effect delivered by the legislature, in 1719: thus preferring bondage to liberty, a patron's presentation to a congregation's call, which our pious ancestors would never have done. So that our modern acceptors cannot skreen their shame by their practice, the cases being so widely different.

But supposing all were true, which some allege concerning the practice of some ancient Presbyterians, while in their reforming state from popish corruptions and abuses; what folly, or rather impiety, must it be in some to be at pains to search out all their infirmities, weaknesses, defects, and imperfections, which are owned to be such by themselves, in order to copy after them, especially when we are under no manner of necessity to do it from the legislature? What! are they wearied of liberty and purity? Would they have the church reduced to her infant and more imperfect state again? Do they prefer that to a state of greater purity and perfection, which we might still maintain if we were inclined to it, seeing the legislature hath been so indulging as to leave the matter at our own choice? Good Lord, deliver us from such infatuation.

The synods of Angus, Aberdeen, and Perth, within these two years past, have emitted warnings in strong terms against this woful officious practice, which has been the origin of so much trouble to this church: I wish they were seconded in the noble attempt by other synods, or by the assembly or commission, which, through the Lord's blessing, might prove an excellent mean to stop the tide of corruption which otherwise is like to flow in upon us. O that the Lord, who hath all men's hearts in his hand, may incline and determine them to it.

When I speak against presentations or encroachments upon our rights and liberties, I have no design to show any contempt of my superiors or their authority, whether in the civil or ecclesiastical courts; but desire to show all due regard to the same, and to be thankful to them for the peaceable exercise of my ministry, without any sinful terms of communion or imposition on my conscience; as also, to bless God for the valuable blessings and privileges we still enjoy above other nations and churches: but, at the same time, I must own, that the consideration of these mercies should not make me or others easy about any appearance of defection or corruption in the clergy, which, if connived at, may soon bring us to as melancholy a condition as other churches.

I honour our supreme judicatories, and would desire to support their authority, and fall in with their acts and decisions, as far as possibly I can; but as we must own, with our "Confession of Faith," there is none of them infallible: so we cannot be bound to give implicit faith to all their determinations; nay, when we judge them wrong, we may warrantably reclaim and address to have them rectified, especially if it be in a matter of great moment; though still I own this ought to be done in the most decent and dutiful manner.

I am heartily sorry that instructions, representations, and addresses, from presbyteries, synods, and bodies of ministers, concerning grievances, have of late years been so disregarded by our assemblies; and that dissents and protestations by particular ministers are not allowed nor recorded. This entertainment doth put ministers to think of other ways to exonerate their minds. And upon that account, I find myself obliged to ease my thoughts in this way concerning the evils and declinings of the present time, lest they should be imputable to me, as a member of the incorporated body, through my connivance or silence. And though my testimony be of small value, yet seeing I have been long in the ministry, and know not how soon I may be called to put off this tabernacle, and to give an account of my stewardship; the Lord prepare me for that time, and for the trials which may abide me before it,—I do, in imitation of some of our worthy predecessors, leave this declaration of my mind behind me, that neither the present nor succeeding ages may be imposed upon, as to my sentiments of the evils of the present times. Wherefore, besides what I have said before and afterwards in my sermon, I here bear my testimony against the atheism, infidelity, immorality, looseness of the age; against all Popish, Socinian, Arian, Arminian, and Antinomian errors in doctrine; against all superstition and human inventions, in worship; against both prelacy and independency in church government; against all simoniacal pactions, officious courting of patrons, and accepting of their presentations; against all spiritual oppression and persecution, and encroachments upon the rights and liberties of this church: as also, against all thrusting and violent imposing of ministers upon Christian congregations; and against all public acts and deeds which favour or promote this imposing course: and likewise, against all proceedings or designs to silence or cast out worthy and useful ministers for remonstrating against such violent settlements, or the acts which authorize and encourage the same, or for refusing to exclude serious Christians from sealing ordinances, who are chargeable with no greater fault than want of freedom to own their relation to such pastors as are violently thrust in upon them; surely there is something grosser required to excommunicate good Christians, and to depose or cast out good ministers, than such things: and I hope we shall see it, when the God of peace inclines us calmly to think and deliberate thereupon.

As for the act of assembly 1732, about which there is so much noise, I was at the assembly in May 1731, when it began; and, I confess, when the overture was in Edinburgh, I carried favourably towards it, though I was not present in the assembly when it came in to be reasoned upon and voted, being called home by express before that time. And that which inclined me to favour the proposal at the first, was the great love I had to the peace and safety of my mother church, which I then saw to be endangered by the patronages and the violent settlements begun to be made in consequence thereof; for I was told by some leading men, whom I thought I might trust, that there was no way to deliver us from those evils; but by our agreeing among ourselves upon some rule for planting churches, which we might lay before the civil government, and get substituted in the room of the patronage act; and that some of our great men gave encouragement to expect this. I was then fixed upon no particular rule, but had favourable thoughts of the acts of parliament 1690, which at first was proposed to be the rule; and in order thereto, it was thought necessary to transmit the same to the presbyteries by way of overture, that they might consider it, and thereby it would be known how far we could agree about it. This seemed to be pretty plausible; for the notion I always had of the plan of settling churches, according to the act 1690, was: That the heritors and elders were to choose a minister, with consent of the congregation; and when there arose any difference about the choice, the case was brought to the presbytery to be cognosed upon by them, they being empowered to judge what was most for edification, whether to proceed to settle the man that seemed to have most of the legal votes, or lay him aside, in case others, with the body of the people, continued dissatisfied, and appoint a new moderation: and sometimes they did the one, and sometimes the other, as they judged most for edification; for the good and edification of the parish was the great rule the judicatories then kept in their eye in their determinations, which commonly had a comfortable issue. I am sure this was the sense the church put upon the act 1690, and proceeded accordingly in settling of churches for twenty-two years after it was made, and had much peace and tranquillity in following that method. As long as I thought the design was to keep things upon this footing, I was easy, the matter not being great who had the liberty of voting, providing matters were so managed, that no man should be thrust in upon a congregation against their will: but as soon as I perceived the design was to carry the affair of settlements beyond the act 1690, I told my mind freely in the presbytery, and proposed an amendment of the overture to prevent any such design, which they were pleased to receive and send over among their instructions to the assembly 1732, which I am sorry they did not think fit to notice. And now, when I compare the two acts together, I find indeed there is a great difference. For, 1. By the act 1690, the heritors and elders are only empowered to name and propose a person to the whole congregation: but, by the act 1732, the heritors and elders are empowered to elect and call one to be minister of the parish. 2. According to the act 1690, the election was not to be looked upon as finished, till the man was proposed to the congregation, and their approbation obtained; and, in case this was refused, the nomination and proposal was to stop, and be laid as an incomplete unfinished affair before the presbytery, that they might give their judgment whether to proceed any further in it or not: but, according to the act 1732, after the heritors and elders have voted, the election is said to be finished, whether the congregation approve or not; nay, the man is reckoned legally elected and called to be minister of the parish, before any notice is taken of the congregation, or the matter at all proposed to them. 3. According to the act 1690, and the sense which was to be put upon it, if the body of the heads of families did object against the man named by the majority of heritors and elders, and say he had not an edifying gift, or that it was not suited to their capacities, and that they had not freedom in their consciences to consent to his being their minister; the presbytery judged such objections, made by an intelligent well-disposed people, sufficient to stop the affair, and to proceed to a new election. All this will appear from our records, and from the nature and strain of the calls given in those days. But according to the act 1732, and the sense now put upon it, let heads of families object what they will against the election, if they be not able to prove error or immorality against the man by two witnesses, they must receive him as their pastor, and so the body of the congregation have no greater power or influence in the settlement, than those who dwell in another nation. Yea, according to this act, as it is now sensed, parishes may be settled, and sometimes are, by a majority of non-residing and disaffected heritors, where the whole elders and people reclaim and protest against the settlement: and surely such settlements, as they are against scripture rules, so they are a sad hindrance and stop to the advancement of the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, and cannot but be most grievous to all who are zealous for his glory, and who make conscience of praying, as he directs, "Thy kingdom come: gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O most mighty; and in thy majesty ride prosperously." Upon which account, I with the greatest humility and earnestness beseech and obtest the reverend and honourable members of the next assembly, to give at least an application of this act, declaring, That it is not the meaning of it to impose ministers upon congregations, where the eldership and body of the people reclaim, nor to contradict our books of discipline and ancient acts of assembly, as the assembly 1586, 1596, 1638, 1649, &c. And I would beg, if I could do it, with tears of blood, that they would not make any such act as this an engine of trouble and persecution in the church, seeing no man pleads that it is founded upon the word of God, but only that it is devised as a proper expedient till the church be delivered from patronages. And about what acts of the church may ministers have liberty to speak their mind so freely, as about those which are owned to be mere human constitutions?

Object. "If ministers be dissatisfied with the acts and constitution of the church, they should withdraw from her, and give up their legal privileges."

Ans. 1. Though this be the common talk of some, there is no warrant for this course in the word of God; for the scripture directs us, when we see things wrong in the church, to plead with our mother, but not to disown her forthwith, or renounce communion with her. 2. Those who talk so now, would be most ready to accuse ministers, if they did withdraw, of making a schism and separation without just cause. "What!" would they say, "is the church so heretical, that they will not hold communion with her? Are such small mistakes, just grounds of separation? Why did they not protest against what they judged wrong, and continue still within the church, as several of our brave ancestors did in former ages?"

Object. "They may plead with their mother, but must not spit in her face."

Ans. 1. I am indeed for a decent and respectful way of pleading with our mother. 2. If some good men shall use a rougher way of dealing than others, in testifying against what is wrong, it ought not to be termed a spitting in their mother's face, nor made a ground of severe censure. If our ancestors, in former ages, had been so narrow and rigid in their way of thinking, what had become of Mr. Knox, Craig, Davidson, Welsh, Bruce, the two Melvils, and many others?

Object. "The church's acts must be obeyed, her sentence executed, and the fence of her authority maintained; otherwise she cannot be preserved from the greatest errors and disorders. We must not see the authority of the General Assembly ruined."

Ans. 1. As for my own part, I was always for maintaining the authority of the General Assembly as sacred and inviolable, seeing it is of so great consequence to the preserving of peace and unity in this church; I have been sorry to see it attacked, or badly used; but, if we would truly preserve it, let us be tender of it, in the making of acts or decisions; being careful that either they be evidently founded upon the word of God, or that there be nothing in them contrary thereunto.

2. When any rule is transgressed which hath nothing but church authority to support it, church censures should be gently used, seeing more rigour in that case ruins authority more than maintains it: we do not read of any church destroyed by her lenity and forbearance in such cases; though severals have been ruined by screwing up authority too high. We may see by long experience, that severe dealing is not the way of convincing men of conscience and zeal of their mistakes: and, by the way, it is a little surprising to see some, whose discourses breathe forth nothing but moderation, peace, charity, and benevolence toward their fellow-creatures, all of a sudden metamorphosed in their tempers, and breathing forth rigour, severity, persecution, and bitter speeches, against their brethren who differ from them but a little in their way of thinking. Ah! what poor changeable creatures we are.

3. If we would have the assembly's authority maintained we must take care, in making acts of general concern, that none of the church's fences or guardian rules be broke through, such as that excellent one, Act 9. assembly 1697, in which, "For the safety of the doctrine, worship, discipline, and government of the church, it is appointed, enacted and declared, that before any general assembly of this church shall pass any acts which are to be binding rules and constitutions to the church, the same acts be first proposed as overtures to the assembly, and being by them passed as such, be remitted to the consideration of the several presbyteries of this church, and their opinions and consents reported by their commissioners to the next assembly, who may then pass the same in acts, if the more general opinion of the church, thus had, agree thereunto." Now this guardian act hath been in force these thirty-six years, and hath been regarded as a fundamental rule and bulwark of our happy constitution; and if it be broke through in the making of any act or rule, how can we expect that such an act will be regarded as a binding rule and constitution to the church, legally enacted? and this seems to be the case with respect to Act 1732; for of forty-nine presbyteries who gave their opinions concerning it, there were no more than six presbyteries in all Scotland for it. Some of them indeed were for it with amendments, but generally these would have altered the nature of it very much from what it is, had they been gone into.

4. In all ages the wisest states and governments have in many cases thought fit to relax their authority in censuring the disobedient; and this hath been so far from ruining their authority, that it hath contributed to preserve and establish it. How many of the ministers of Scotland were guilty of disobedience to the assembly, 1606, at Linlithgow, who appointed them to accept of constant moderations; and to the assembly, 1618, who appointed them to receive the five articles of Perth? Did ever the church carry the matter so far, as to suspend or depose any of the disobedient brethren? Or, was the authority of the General Assembly ruined by such connivance? Have we not seen many General Assemblies since that time highly regarded, and their authority in a flourishing condition?

After all, I humbly beg, that none may be offended with my freedom in handling these matters, seeing conscience hath moved me to it, for the safety of my mother church, which I stand engaged by the strongest ties to promote, and which at this juncture I take to be in extreme danger; and in such cases omnis homo est miles.

I wish also, for the safety and quiet of the church, that the dissents and protestations of members and judicatories were allowed to be recorded, with their reasons. And I see not why this might not be allowed, under proper regulations, in our supreme ecclesiastical judicatories, as well as in the house of peers of Great Britain. Why should we think it a greater affront to our authority than they do to theirs? Or, do we pretend to infallibility more than they?

Likewise, it would add to the church's safety, that both the numbers and qualifications of ruling elders allowed to sit in assemblies, and commissions, were better regulated, and more narrowly canvassed. And many are of opinion, that the expediency of ruling elders from burghs should of new be taken into serious consideration.

And, I am sure, it is not much for our safety, that national and provincial fasts are so much neglected, when providence so loudly calls us to the work of humiliation and prayer; when sin is arriving to so great a height, when clouds of wrath are gathering so fast; when all Europe is threatened with blood and confusion, and when destructive divisions and schisms are ready to break out among us at home; and O, do not these frightful appearances proclaim it to be a proper season for us to meet, and fast, and mourn, and see if they can weep our hearts into one lump, and, by our united prayers, prevail with God, for Christ's sake, to "spare his people, and not give his heritage to reproach;" or else, that he will prepare us to meet him, when coming in the way of his judgments? And, if judgment begin at the house of God, what shall be the end of these that obey not the gospel? O that God, in his mercy, may awaken us in time to think on these things! Amen.

A SERMON.

"LET THE PRIESTS, THE MINISTERS OF THE LORD, WEEP BETWEEN THE PORCH AND THE ALTAR, AND LET THEM SAY, SPARE THY PEOPLE, O LORD, AND GIVE NOT THINE HERITAGE TO REPROACH; THAT THE HEATHEN SHOULD RULE OVER THEM: WHEREFORE SHOULD THEY SAY AMONG THE PEOPLE, WHERE IS THEIR GOD?—JOEL ii. 17.

At this time twenty-one years ago, (viz., Oct. 1712,) I opened the synod by a sermon on 1 Sam. iv. 13, concerning Eli's heart "trembling for the ark of God." Many of the members of the synod are removed by death since that time; but those who survive may remember it was a very threatening time to that church; yet it pleased our gracious God to save us from the storm then impending, and allow her many halcyon days since, though, alas! badly improved: wherefore the clouds seem to gather again, and look very black; and a new storm from another quarter, if God prevent not, is ready to blow. I have chosen therefore this text, which calls us for more than trembling hearts for the ark, even weeping eyes, and praying lips also; and O that all these qualifications might meet in us at this time!

In Joel's time, the church and people of God were threatened with a desolating judgment: to prevent it, he calls them to public national fasting and humiliation; duties most proper for a people exposed to public national calamities. In the text, we have a number of special directions given to ministers for carrying on this work; in which let us Observe, 1. The persons addressed, the priests or ministers of God. Why? Because they who were the people's mouth to God, upon other occasions, were especially called at this time to stand in the open, to turn away God's wrath from the church. Though others are not exempted from this duty, yet it is the business of ministers, in a special manner, Joel i. 13, "Lie all night in sackcloth, ye ministers of my God." When others mourn in the day, it is your duty to mourn both night and day.

2. Observe the place where they are to mourn and wrestle; "between the porch and the altar," that is, the stately porch built by Solomon, and the great brazen altar, the public place where they used to attend the offering of the sacrifices, there they are to pour out their tears and prayers in view of all the people, that, by the minister's example, the people may be affected and wrought into the like pious disposition of mind.

3. Observe the words the ministers are directed to use and enlarge upon in their prayers to God; "Spare thy people, O Lord, and give not thine heritage to reproach," &c. In which there are several strong arguments used to prevail with God for the church:

(1.) They are to cry, "Spare, O Lord," q. d., "We confess our guilt and ill deservings; we acknowledge the justice of thy proceedings, though we should be cut off; all our relief is in thy sparing mercy, and this we humbly look up to, and plead for, with a merciful God."

(2.) Another plea is taken from the relation they stood in unto God; "We are thy people, thine heritage:" "We are the people thou hast set thy love upon, separated from thy church, taken into covenant with thee, ransomed from Egyptian bondage, delivered from many enemies and dangers, and preserved from ruin by a train of miraculous providences; Lord, spare the inheritances thou hast purchased for thyself at so dear a rate."

(3.) They are to plead the reproach and contempt which would fall upon the church and people of God, if God give up with them; "give not up thine heritage to reproach," q. d. "If thou send a famine upon us, which was the judgment immediately threatened, then the fruitful land of Canaan, the glory of all lands, shall be reproached as a poor, beggarly, and barren land, insufficient to afford sacrifices for the temple: yea, we shall soon fall under the reproach of servitude to our heathen neighbours, who will make an easy prey of us, if once we be famished, and deprive us both of our civil and spiritual liberties, and especially of God's ordinances, the symbols of his presence, and means of communion with him; which we value as our great honour and happiness above other nations."

Lastly, They are to plead in prayer, that the reproach of the church will some way reflect upon her God and protector; "Wherefore should they say among the people, where is their God?" q. d. "These barbarous people, who watched for our halting, will not consider our sins and ill deservings at God's hand, but will talk reproachfully of God, saying, Where is the God they trusted in, the God of whose power, mercy, and faithfulness they boasted so much? They will say he is either weak, and could not help them in extremity, or unkind, and would not. Lord, spare and pity the church, for thy name, thy glory's sake. The master of our reproach is not so great; but,

Lord, what wilt thou do for thy great and glorious name?"

DOCT.—IN TIME OF THE CHURCH'S DANGER, MINISTERS ARE ESPECIALLY CALLED TO MOURN, PLEAD, AND WRESTLE WITH GOD FOR HER, THAT SHE MAY NOT BE ABANDONED OR GIVEN UP TO REPROACH.

In prosecuting this subject I propose to show,

1. When it may be said, that a church is left or given up to reproach.

2. Why ministers should be so earnest with God to prevent this calamity.

3. Make improvement suitable to the case of the church.

I. The first head is, to show when a church may be said to be left or given up to reproach and contempt.

And here I shall mention several reproachful and church exposing evils, which ministers ought mournfully and fervently to deprecate, especially when a church is threatened with them. As,

1. When a church falls into a backsliding condition, religion in her is under a visible decay; her members leave their first love, degenerate from their predecessors' piety and zeal, turn loose and indifferent about God's truths, their former declared principles, and the solemn engagements they lie under to maintain them; and not only so, but turn careless also about the practice and duties of religion, such as family-worship, secret prayer, sabbath-sanctification, and gospel-holiness: when people lose their former spirituality and liveliness in God's service, and their duties dwindle away into a dead formality: when they content themselves with external ordinances and communions, without communion with God in them: when they turn carnal in their conversation; Christian love declines, malice, hatred, and envy increases: then it is that a church is left and given up to reproach; these are church-disgracing evils, which ministers should earnestly deprecate, and cry, "Spare."

2. When destructive schisms and divisions invade a church, so that good men, both ministers and professors of religion, entertain rough thoughts, and break out into uncharitable reflections, and severe censures one against another, and will not use lenity or forbearance to them who differ from them in some lesser things. These are evils we should earnestly pray against, seeing they manifestly tend to expose and ruin a church; for they put a stop to the progress of the gospel, the conversion of souls, and in bringing of strangers to Christ: they hinder the sweet fellowship of Christians together, and their mutual prayers with and for one another; and open a flood-gate for innumerable other evils: as, for instance, they take us off from the vitals and essentials of religion, the life and power of godliness; and, in the room thereof, engage and employ us into many needless disputes, passionate strivings, envious whispers, unchristian backbitings, and revengeful actions. How sadly verified do we find that word of the apostle, James ii. 16, "Where envying and strife is, there is confusion, and every evil work!" We have reason to plead and cry against this woful spirit of strife and contention; for where it takes place, the church's best friend is highly provoked, the "prince of peace;" and she herself is sadly exposed to the scorn and derision of her enemies.

3. It is most reproachful to a church, when doctrinal errors creep into her, when her teachers begin to resile from the pure truths of God handed down to them, and vent doctrines which have a tendency to Arminianism, Arianism, or Deism; when they extol natural reason more than revelation, the power of corrupt nature more than efficacious free grace, men's own moral performances more than imputed righteousness, Jesus Christ as a pattern more than as a propitiation; or any other opinions which tend to sap the foundation of Christianity, or reproach the Holy Spirit's operations, and life of faith, with the name of enthusiasm: these are church-exposing evils, which we ought to bewail and pray against.

4. It is reproachful to a church, when she is smitten with barrenness and unfruitfulness, with respect to converting of souls, and bringing forth children to God: when the great doctrine of regeneration and the new-birth is little preached or experienced in her; or, when in judgment she has given her a miscarrying womb and dry breasts. "Lord, spare thy people, and give not thine heritage to this reproach."

5. It is a church-disgracing evil, when God withdraws his Holy Spirit and his gracious influences from her ministers and teachers, in any measure or degree; of which there are many, and each of them is to be dreaded and appreciated by us. As, (1.) When we are deprived of the gifts and qualifications we once had. (2.) When the light and knowledge we retain, hath no influence on our consciences. (3.) When we lose our spirituality and liveliness in the worship and service of God. (4.) When we are straitened in our approaches to God. (5.) When we begin to think duty a weariness, and our hearts are alienated from it. (6.) When heart-plagues and indwelling corruptions prevail and increase, as heart-atheism, unbelief, carnality, &c. (7.) When we incline towards the temptations of sin, and society of ungodly men. (8.) When wonted restraints are taken off, and we turn loose and profane in our lives, so as, like Eli's sons, to tempt men to abhor the offerings of the Lord. "O Lord, spare thy people, and give not thy church to this reproach."

6. It is reproachful to the Lord's vineyard, when breaches are made in her walls and fences, so that her enemies, the foxes and wild beasts, break in and spoil the vines; when strangers devour her strength, those of a different persuasion and communion spoil her of her ancient rights and liberties: when patrons and their abettors thrust in pastors upon Christian congregations against their will, whereby God's ordinances are deserted, the ministry is contemned, the Lord's day is profaned, the flock of Christ is scattered and exposed as a prey to seducers. These are evils we should bewail and pray against with tears, crying, "Lord, spare thy church, and give her not up to this reproach."

7. It is disgracing to a church, when God hides his face from her, when under oppression and distress, and covers himself with a cloud, that their prayers cannot pass through; so that enemies are ready to say, as in the text, "Where is their God?" "Where is the fruit of all your prayers? where is he in whom you trusted for help? where is your covenanted God, of whose promises to relieve you in trouble, you were wont to boast?" This reproach is as a sword in his people's bones, Psal. xlii. 10, against which let us pray, "Lord, spare thy people, and give not thine heritage to this sad reproach."

8. It sadly exposes a church when her pillars are removed; when those are discouraged or taken away, who were wont to weep and wrestle between the porch and the altar, and stood in the breach to keep off wrath from her; when her burning and shining lights are extinguished; the precious sons of Zion are thrown by as earthen pitchers; when faithful teachers are removed into corners or graves, and such put in her room, who are unexperienced in religion, harden people in their sins, or lull them asleep in a Christless and unregenerate state. It is distressing to a church, when her pillars are struck at, persecution is intended against the champions of Christ's cause, whereby others are intimidated with fear to own it. How low was the church brought in Herod's time, Acts xii. when James was killed with the sword, Peter in prison ready to be executed, and all the rest of the apostles were designed as a sacrifice! Then the pillars shook, the disciples trembled, and the enemies triumphed. This was a time of reproach; and it becomes all the ministers of the Lord to weep between the porch and the altar, and cry, "Spare thy people, O Lord, give not thine heritage to this reproach, or any other church disgracing evil."

II. The second head I proposed, was, to show why ministers should be so earnest with God, to avert these church-exposing evils. Reasons for it.

1. Because God expressly requires this at their hand, as in the text, and also in Isa. lxii. 6, 7,

"I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem."—"Ye that make mention of the Lord, keep not silence. And give him no rest, till he establish Jerusalem." Where we may see the great end for which God sets ministers in such public posts; it is not to keep silence in an evil time, as other prudent men may do, but to speak aloud in Zion's behalf, and to intercede and wrestle with God for her. And we see God requires faithfulness in this matter.

2. This hath been the approved practice of the Lord's prophets and ministers in all ages. How earnest was Moses, in wrestling and pleading for the church in his day! Exod. xxviii. 11—13, "And Moses besought the Lord his God, and said, Lord, Why doth thy wrath wax hot against thy people, which thou hast brought forth out of the land of Egypt, with great power and a mighty hand? Wherefore should the Egyptians speak, and say, For mischief did he bring them out, to slay them in the mountains, and consume them from the earth? Turn from thy fierce wrath, and repent of this evil against thy people. Remember Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, thy servants, to whom thou swarest," &c. Here is an intercessory prayer for Israel, full of the most powerful arguments, worthy of our imitation. In like manner was the prophet Samuel employed for the church in his time, 1 Sam. xii. 23, "As for me, saith he, God forbid that I should sin against the Lord, in ceasing to pray for you." So the prophet David wrestled for the church, Ps. xiv. 7, "O that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion." Psal. xxv. 22, "Redeem Israel, O God, out of all his troubles," Psal. li. 18. "Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion, build thou the walls of Jerusalem." So Asaph, Psal. lxxx. 14, "Return, we beseech thee, O God of hosts; look down from heaven, and visit this vine," &c. Likewise the prophet Isaiah was thus concerned, Isa. lxii. 1, "For Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake will I not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth. And so the prophet Daniel wrestled fervently for the church, Dan. ix. 16—19. So did Nehemiah, Neh. i. 5—9, &c. And so did the apostle Paul, Rom. i. 9; x. 1; Eph. i. 16, 17. But I have a greater pattern to lay before you than all these, even that of the angel of the covenant, the great prophet and teacher of the church, Zech. i. 12. How earnestly doth he plead for the church in distress! "O Lord of hosts, how long wilt thou not have mercy on Jerusalem, and the cities of Judah, against which thou hast had indignation these seventy years?" Let us imitate him.

3. Because God is exceedingly delighted with such pleadings, and allows great familiarity to those who intercede for his church, Isa. xlv. 11. and promises prosperity to them, Psal. cxxii. 6.

4. Ministers should be more earnest for the church in trouble than other men, because they are Christ's principal servants, who should be more zealous for their glorious master than others, and know best the near relation the church stands in to him, that she is his city, his house, his heritage, his spouse, his body, and the purchase of his blood. And therefore ministers, for their master's sake, should interpose with the greatest earnestness for the church.

5. Because ministers are, by their office, bound to have more compassion than others on precious souls, which cannot miss to be in a miserable situation, when the church is distressed with spiritual judgments, as the withdrawing of the Spirit from ordinances, and the plague of dry breasts.

6. Because at such a time the souls of ministers are like to suffer, as well as others; for the church, being the mother of us all; if it be ill with her, and her condition sickly and pining, our souls must languish with other men's.

7. Because ministers should best know the hazard of being silent and unconcerned about the church's danger and trouble; seeing there is a heavy woe denounced against them, "who are at ease in Zion, and are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph," Amos vi. 1, 6. And they know what wrath was threatened against Esther, if she kept silence when the church was in danger, Esther iv. 14, "For if thou altogether hold thy peace at this time, then shall enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place, but thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed."

III. Head third.—The Improvement.—First, Use may be of Lamentation, upon the account of our silence and unconcernedness who are ministers about the church of God when in danger and distress. Ah! how few are there among us of Eli's disposition this day, whose hearts are trembling for the ark of God! How few weeping between the porch and the altar, and crying, "Spare thy people, O Lord, and give not thine inheritance to reproach." Witness the unfrequency of fast-days, and the cold entertainment given to motions for observing them. What! is it a time for silence and easiness, when the affairs of Zion are in such a melancholy situation both at home and abroad? Is it time for us to dwell at ease in our ceiled houses, when the Lord's house is threatened to be laid waste by our woful backslidings, and destructive divisions? Is it becoming the character of Christ's ambassadors to show an indifferency about his church's danger, and to act the part of a heathen Gallio, to care for none of these things? O what cause have we to bewail the case of those who can be easy about the public interest of the church, if it go well with their own private affairs; who care not, if they can swim in prosperity, though the church be drowned in tears and blood! What is this! but to be like the king and Haman, who sat down to drink when the city Shushan was perplexed, Esther iii. 15. For a Christian minister to mind his private concerns, and neglect the public, is as great folly, as if a sailor in a storm should notice only his private chest, and neglect the vessel in which he and his effects are embarked. It is recorded, as a praise-worthy action, and a noble evidence of a public spirit in one Terentius, a captain under the emperor Valens, who, having done some special service to the emperor, for which he judged him worthy of an eminent reward, he bid him ask what he would have, and it should be granted. Whereupon, after an advisement, he wrote a petition to the emperor, That the orthodox Christians might have liberty of a church by themselves, where they might worship God separately from the Arians. The emperor, being Arian himself, was much offended with the petition, tore it in pieces, and threw it away, bidding the captain ask something for himself: but he, carefully gathering up the pieces of his torn petition, said, If he could not be heard in Christ's cause, he would ask nothing for himself. Alas! that we who are Christ's ministers, should fall so much short of this soldier in concern for Christ's interest!

But the best improvement we can make of this doctrine is for amendment; and therefore I shall proceed to a Second use of Exhortation.—And here, my dear brethren, suffer me to be your humble remembrancer, and my own monitor; and the duty exhorted to, is, that I have been insisting upon from the text, weep and pray for all the churches of God that are in distress, and especially the church of Scotland, our mother church, which at this day is in danger of being torn in pieces and destroyed, if God, in his mercy, do not prevent it. O let us cry with all our might. "Lord, spare thy people, and give not thine heritage, in Scotland, to reproach: wherefore shall they say among the people, Where is their God?" And, for your encouragement to wrestle and plead with God in her behalf, let me offer these considerations:

1. Such pleadings are most acceptable to God, and prevalent with him. Who are they but the wrestlers that deliver the church, and preserve the island?

2. Those who are most concerned for the church in danger, shall have the greatest share in her comforts when God rescues her. They who sow most of the seed of tears for Zion, shall reap most of her joys, when the harvest comes.

3. We have noble arguments to make use of in pleading with God for this poor church, as well as they had of old for Israel.

As, (1.) The compassion of his nature, which hath often interposed for this church, when he seemed to have given her up. So was it in the case of Israel, Judg. x. 14, where God appeared to reject them, and bid them "Go cry to the gods they had chosen, and let these deliver them in the time of their trouble;" yet when Israel persisted in crying for pity, it is said, ver. 16, "His soul was grieved for the misery of Israel, and he delivered them."

(2.) We may plead the glory of his name, as of old, Jer. xiv. 21, "Lord, do not disgrace the throne of thy glory," viz., the temple where thy glory is displayed: q. d. "Lord, we deserve to have disgrace put upon us; but O let it be in such a way that the disgrace may not reflect upon thyself, upon thy worship, thy ordinances, thy attributes, thy promises. Let not our enemies have occasion to reproach thy name, or to say, "Where is now their God?" "Where is the God they always boasted of, as superior to all the gods of the nations?" So may we say, "Lord, do for thy own name sake;" it is no great matter what become of the ministers or professors of Scotland; but what wilt thou do for thy great name that may come some way to suffer with them? "Lord, what will the Egyptians say?" Exod. xxxii.

(3.) We may plead his covenant with us, as they did, Jer. xiv. 21, "Lord, remember and break not covenant with us." Though we have broke to thee, Lord, do not thou break to us. We are a people in covenant with thee more explicitly than other nations; we are a land peculiarly given to Christ by the Father's donation, as being amongst the ends and uttermost parts of the earth, and among the isles, which have seen his salvation, and waited for his law; we are a land most solemnly devoted to God by our reforming ancestors, who, in a national way, avouched the Lord to be their God; and at the same time gave up themselves and their posterity to the Lord; and thou, Lord, didst declare thyself well pleased with the bargain; thou didst fill the temple with thy glory, work great deliverance for us, and raised up saviours unto us, when we were brought very low. O do not now forsake thine inheritance!

DIRECTIONS.

I proceed, in the next place, with all humility, to offer some advices proper for ministers of the gospel, relative to this subject: and, that I may the better reach them, I shall propose and answer some questions.

Quest. 1. "What things shall we pray for at this time unto this church, for preventing her reproach, retrieving her credit, and promoting her welfare?"

Ans. 1. Let us pray for a spirit of repentance, mourning, and supplication, to all ranks among us, that we may all be disposed to humble ourselves before the Lord, and mournfully to bewail our sins, our backslidings, and defections, which have provoked God to withdraw from us, and threaten to give us up to reproach. O that Scotland were brought to the temper of penitent returning Israel, 1 Sam. vii. 2, where it is said, that "all Israel lamented after the Lord!" Were all ranks moved in a penitent manner to come and lament after a departing God, it would be a hopeful token for the land.

2. Let us pray for God's pouring out his Spirit from on high upon the ordinances and assemblies of this land, for convincing, enlightening, and converting of souls to the Lord: for our affairs will never take a turn to the better, "until the Spirit be poured out from on high," Isa. xxxii. 15; till then, our wilderness will not be turned to a fruitful field. Well, then, let us all pray for a time when gospel-ordinances, dispensed by us, shall be remarkably backed by God's power, and presence; for a time when, by the effusion of the Spirit, a great and effectual door shall be opened to us, as was to Paul at Ephesus, 1 Cor. xvi. 9, "a door of utterance" opened in ministers' mouths, and a door of entrance in sinners' hearts; a time when ministers' minds shall be enlightened, their hearts warmed, memories strengthened, and tongues loosed; so that they shall have a great facility in uttering their thoughts; "their hearts shall indite a good matter, and their tongues be as the pen of a ready writer." Let us pray for the time when ministers' mouths shall be opened, and hearers' appetites sharpened, when ministers' hearts shall be enlarged, and hearers' hearts melted; when the arrows of the word shall be directed by a powerful hand, to pierce the consciences of men, and they brought thereby to make serious inquiries about their eternal state, "What must we do to be saved?" This would retrieve our credit.

3. Let us pray earnestly for the down-pouring of the Spirit upon young students and expectants of the holy ministry, that God may make them acquainted with regeneration-work in their younger years, and raise up amongst them eminent instruments of his glory; make them burning and shining lights, men of public spirits, who will desire to spend and be spent for the glory of Christ and the winning of souls; men that will prefer Jerusalem to their chiefest joy; men that will be suitably weighted with the work they are undertaking, and concerned to be cleared about their having God's call to it; men that will not rush forwardly upon the work, have an active hand in thrusting themselves into the vineyard, and so run unsent, but wait patiently till God clear their way. O that God would raise up such a ministry in Scotland for the next age! O that he would send such labourers into his harvest! This would prevent our reproach, and retrieve our credit.

4. Let us pray for the continuance of the purity of doctrine and worship in the land, that God may preserve us from deism, and whatever hath a tendency thereto; and from all Popish, Socinian, or Arian errors; and that he may deliver us from all Pelagian and Arminian tenets and opinions; that so men may see and acknowledge God in every thing; whereas Pelagians and Arminians scarce see God in any thing, but make man himself, as it were, a god, by ascribing all to his natural powers, and making him independent with respect to his conversion and spiritual performances. O what a reproach would it be to us, if such errors should prevail among us!

5. Let us pray for the preservation of the peace and unity of this church, and that our breaches may all be healed, and greater breaches prevented; that God may pity us in our present situation, and raise up peace-makers amongst us; that he may inspire all the ministers of this church with a spirit of meekness, charity, and forbearance towards their brethren, who cannot attain to the same light with them in some lesser matters; and that he may deliver us from a spirit of bitterness, malice, or persecution, against our brethren. O how monstrous and reproachful will it be, for those who bear the character of Christ's lambs and doves, to fall to a-biting and tearing one another, like lions and beasts of prey!

6. Let us pray for the removing of all these things which are the causes of division and contention among us; and, particularly, for deliverance from all spiritual oppression, and encroachments upon the rights and liberties of this church, by patrons and others, that so congregations may be supplied with pastors, with the consent and good-liking of the members thereof; this would contribute much for the welfare, and prevent our reproach.

7. Let us pray that God would pour out a spirit of reformation, and of zeal for piety, and against all manner of sin and vice, upon all ranks of persons amongst us; such as magistrates, ministers, elders, heads of families, parents, and teachers of youth; so that every person, in their respective stations, may vigorously exert themselves for suppressing sin, and recommending the exercise of godliness amongst those committed to their charge; and hereby the credit and prosperity of the church would be in a great measure promoted.

Quest. 2. How is it that we must pray for the church, so as to prevail?

Ans. 1. "Let us pray in faith," Jam. i. 6, believing that God is infinite in power, and able to help; full of compassion, and ready to help; and depending entirely upon the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ, for acceptance in our prayers. 2. Let us pray with fervency, like Jacob, who wrestled with God, when he prayed. Let us, by importunate addresses, besiege heaven with holy violence; and, like Samson, let us bow ourselves with all our might, in order to pull down the pillars of Dagon's temple. 3. Let us join penitent tears with our fervent prayers; for in the text, we find weeping and praying linked together; also the famous wrestler Jacob "wept and made supplication," when he prevailed with the angel, Hos. xii. 4. 4. Let us pray in an argumentative manner, when we plead with God for his church: let us fill our mouths with arguments, as in the text, and as Moses did, Exod. xxxii. 11—13. 5. Let us pray with perseverance, as we are directed, Eph. vi. 18; Rom. xii. 12. "Hold not your peace, give him no rest," saith the prophet, Isa. lxii. 1, 6, 7. 6. Let our prayers be joined with a diligent use of the means, to obtain the favours we ask: as idle beggars are not welcome to man's door, so neither are they to God's. And this leads to Quest. 3. What are those means and endeavours proper to be used by us, in conjunction with our prayers, in order to obtain the credit and prosperity of this church, and to prevent her reproach?

Ans. I desire, in the humblest manner, to offer these following to my brethren's consideration:

1. Let us all endeavour to be like the well-furnished scribe, that bringeth forth out of his treasure, "things both new and old," i. e., Let us study to be furnished with a stock of necessary and useful knowledge, that we may bring forth variety of provision for the entertainment of our people's souls: "The priests' lips should preserve knowledge." In the first place, Let us all be well-skilled in scripture knowledge, in the knowledge of God and his perfections, and of the mystery of the Trinity, so far as revealed, and of Jesus Christ our surety and sacrifice. Likewise, we need the knowledge of human arts and sciences, and of the languages; and especially these in which the holy bible was first written: this knowledge is a good hand-maid to divinity and scripture knowledge; and, for acquiring these, we ought to have nurseries of learning, and schools of the prophets, as in ancient ages.

There is a set lately risen among us, who decri such knowledge as unnecessary for gospel-ministers, and therefore make choice of illiterate men for that office. But, if the devil should stir up Arians, Socinians, Deists, or others, to make an attack upon our holy religion, what could such men do to defend it? If Rome should send her subtle Jesuits and learned priests among us to subvert the Protestant doctrines, and mislead our people, how would these unlearned preachers be able to maintain them, and discover the fallacies of their arguments?

Object. O, say they, we have the word to oppose them.

Ans. 1. Had there not been men of learning before you to have translated it, you even would not have had that. 2. Put the best sword ever was in the hand of one that wants skill to use it, he could not thereby defend himself against him that is expert in the art of fencing. When the cunning Jesuit shall allege, The passage you quote is not justly translated, what would you answer him? It hath been judiciously observed, by the authors of our ecclesiastical histories, that the bloody emperor Dioclesian did not so much mischief to the church and her ministers, as the emperor Julian the apostate did. The first, indeed, put many of them to death; but the devil learned Julian another way, viz., to take away the maintenance of ministers, and put down their schools of learning; and hereby Julian did the greatest damage of the two: for though Dioclesian took many eminent men away, there still arose others in their stead; but the robbing of ministers and schools of learning, of their maintenance and revenues, hindered a succession of able ministers in the church. And shall any lover of Zion join issue with that infamous apostate? Let young preachers and expectants remember this, that they may diligently improve their excellent opportunities in furnishing themselves with the knowledge of the languages, history, philosophy, mathematics, geography, astronomy, and polemic divinity, which are good handmaids to scripture-knowledge: and this would be one way to promote the welfare of this church, and prevent her reproach; for an ignorant ministry is a reproach to any church.

II. Let all of us study, in a special manner, to be found among those who deserve the character of able ministers of the New Testament, mentioned by the apostle, 2 Cor. iii. 6. Quest. Who is it that may be denominated an able minister of the New Testament? Ans. He is one that is well skilled in the mystery of Christ, and him crucified; that knows how to open up the covenant of grace, and the method of our justification by Jesus Christ, and his righteousness only. He makes it his main business to hold forth the excellency and usefulness of Christ, both for our justification and sanctification. He looks upon Jesus Christ as the Christian's great surety and sacrifice, and also as his head of influence, his life, and that "without Christ we can do nothing:" and, therefore, he makes it the great end of his sermons to exalt Christ, and free grace displayed through him; to preach up Christ, and preach down self; to make Christ all, and self nothing: and, whether he preach duties or privileges, threatenings or promises, the tendency of all is to lead sinners from a covenant of works to a covenant of grace, from self to Christ. Again, this New Testament minister not only preaches up the excellency of the righteousness of Christ, and of faith therein, for our salvation; but he also insists upon the necessity of repentance for sin, and reformation from it: he presses the practice of holiness and all moral duties, to complete the character of a true Christian: he assures all his hearers, that "without holiness no man can see God:" seeing it is impossible a man can be a good Christian, profess what he will, unless he be a good moralist; he must mind the second table duties as well as the first; he must not only attend divine worship, but he must be sober, honest, chaste, meek, just, merciful, charitable, and beneficent, minding his neighbour's interest as well as his own; and in these things following the example of the holy Jesus, his Lord and Pattern. But then, the New Testament minister is concerned that men's morals be of the right stamp; that they be Christian morals, and of the same nature with gospel-holiness or sanctification; and, in order thereto, he directs men to Jesus Christ, the treasure and fountain of grace and holiness, the fountain of sanctification as well as of justification. Morality, performed in the strength of nature, is still sour fruit, and can never please God, till it spring from Christ as the root; unregenerate morality, however far men advance in it, is still but nature at the best. The heart must be renewed, and the soul united to Christ, before morality can be refined into gospel-holiness, and moral virtues commence Christian graces. The gospel minister teacheth, that all acceptable morality, all true grace or holiness, is the proper result of the soul's union with the holy Jesus, our living head, who is the first and immediate receptacle of the Holy Spirit, and of all sanctifying influences for the use of his members: and out of his fulness we must, by faith, receive those vital and quickening influences necessary for promoting sanctification in us. And, O how much would it be for the credit and interest of this and every Christian church, to be duly provided with such able ministers of the New Testament!

III. Let us be diligent in instructing our people in the knowledge of the first principles of Christianity, and especially in catechising of the youth. The most famous of the ancient fathers have gloried in their being catechists. This is a most necessary part of our work: for, if the foundations of knowledge be not carefully laid among our people, our success must be marred, the best sermons will be lost upon them, if ignorance prevail among them. And, seeing youth is the moulding age, and the proper season for receiving instruction, we ought to improve it well, by frequent and diligent catechising. A vessel will long retain the scent of that with which it is first seasoned; so persons are more ready to retain good impressions made upon them in the time of youth, than afterwards. Let us look upon the young as the seed of the next generation, as the lambs of the flock, towards whom a special care and tenderness is to be expressed. The first charge Christ gave to Peter, was, "to feed his lambs," the young and weak of the flock. This is the most usual season of conversion, the time when the heart is soonest melted, and the affections are the most pliable; and if ever we prevail with sinners, youth is the most likely time for it. And, therefore, let us have a tender care of the young in our congregations, and more especially at their first admission to the Lord's table: this is the time of their renewing their baptismal covenant, their becoming Christians by their own voluntary choice, as well as by their parents' dedication; the time of their entering into the adult state of church members; the time of laying the foundation-stone of their spiritual building, their soul's salvation: and, therefore, it should be done with deliberation, holy skill, and deep digging, by humiliation, repentance, self-searching, renouncing self-righteousness, and removing all false foundations, till they win to the rock Christ, and his most perfect righteousness, as the only ground of their justification and acceptance at God's bar. And this being such a critical time for their souls, we ought, according to the assembly's direction, diligently to instruct them before their first admission to the Lord's supper, particularly as to the covenant of grace, and the articles thereof; and take them solemnly engaged thereunto, and that in a more express way than we did their fathers at their baptism. Let us put such questions to them as these, and wait for their answers:

1. Q. What sense have you of your misery by nature, and while under the covenant of works?

2. Q. Do you see the need you stand in of the Mediator's help to relieve you out of this state?

3. Q. Are you sensible of your breaking your baptismal engagements, by running away from Christ your captain, going over to the devil's camp, and standing long out against Christ's calls?

4. Q. Are you desirous to return unto the Lord, as penitent prodigals, and mourning backsliders, with your face Zion-wards, weeping as you go, willing to renew your baptismal vows, saying,

"Come, let us join ourselves to the Lord in an everlasting covenant, never to be forgotten?"

5. Q. Are you content to break with the trinity of hell, and engage with the trinity of heaven? i. e., Are you content to renounce the world, the devil, and the flesh; and to accept of God the Father as your Father, God the Son as your Redeemer, and God the Holy Ghost as your Sanctifier, in whose name ye are baptized?

6. Q. Do you admire redeeming love in the Son of God, his undertaking to be a surety and sacrifice for the race of fallen Adam, when he past by fallen angels?

7. Q. Do you heartily approve of this excellent contrivance and gospel-method of salvation, through the suretyship and sanctification of Jesus Christ? Do ye think this a device worthy of God, and of infinite wisdom?

8. Q. Are you therefore willing to renounce your own righteousness and strength, as insufficient to answer the demands of the law, and to accept of a surety for both, and say, "in the Lord Jesus I have righteousness and strength;" I am willing to make use of a borrowed strength for my performing of duty, and of a borrowed righteousness for my acceptance in duty?

9. Q. Are you willing to go in to this self-denying method of salvation; and are you well pleased with it, as it tends to make you eternal debtors to free grace, excludes all glorying and boasting in the creature, and ascribes all the glory of your salvation to Christ only; takes the crown off the head of self, and puts it on the head of Christ?

10. Q. Are you content to accept of Jesus Christ, the mediator between God and man, in all his offices; as a prophet, to instruct and teach you; as a priest, to atone and intercede for you; and as a king, to rule in and over you?

11. Q. Are you content to take Christ as a king to govern you by his laws, as well as a priest to save you by his blood? Are you desirous he should come in as a king to execute his kingly office in your soul, to set up his throne in your heart, and subdue all indwelling sin, and to conquer all your lusts and corruptions?

12. Q. Do you look on your sins as the enemies and crucifiers of Christ? And do you resolve, through his grace, to throw out every one of them, and to harbour none of these murderers; and to give no house-room nor heart-room to the least nail or thorn that pierced Christ?

13. Q. Are you willing to cut off every right hand, and pluck out every right eye for Christ, and not to count any sin too dear to part with for Jesus Christ?

14. Q. Do you desire to come to Christ for sanctification as well as for justification; for holiness as well as for happiness; for conformity and likeness to God, as well as for access to dwell with God?

15. Q. Do you come willingly, as a volunteer, at the sound of the gospel-trumpet, to list yourself under Christ's banner, resolving to forsake the devil's camp, and swear allegiance to king Jesus; to take up arms for him, and fight against his enemies, the devil, the world, and the flesh, all the days of your life?

16. Q. Do you accept of all God's ordinances, his word, sacraments, prayers, &c., as necessary helps to heaven, and means of conveying grace, which you will esteem and make use of with care and diligence?

17. Q. Do you accept of Christ's people, those who bear his image, as your beloved friends, your fellow-travellers; firmly resolving to join with Christ's little flock, his praying flock, his sin-hating flock, his flock that fear an oath, and that notwithstanding of the reproach of singularity?

18. Q. Do you, through his grace, purpose never to follow the multitude to do evil, or join with them in common sins; but stedfastly to avoid and resist all the temptations and snares of evil company, and say with David to them, "Depart from me, ye evil doers, for I will keep the commandments of my God?"

19. Q. Are you willing to accept of the rod and discipline of Christ's house; to welcome his convictions and reproofs, as well as his comforts and smiles; to take Christ with his cross as well as Christ with his crown; to suffer the world's hatreds and scoffs, and other persecutions, for Christ?

20. Q. Are you resolved through grace, that no temptation or discouragement should make you prove runaways or deserters from the Captain of your salvation; but that you will adhere to him, and abide by his standard all the days of your life?

21. Q. As you are content to accept of Christ, and all that belongs to him, are you not also willing to give up and surrender yourself to the Lord, and all that belongs unto you, to be disposed of by him at his pleasure; all that you are, soul and body, heart, mind, will, conscience, memory, and all that you have—time, talents, relations, enjoyments, &c.?

22. Q. When Christ and the devil are striving for your heart, and each of them saying, "My son, give me thy heart;" and when Christ is putting it to your choice, in the days of youth, saying, Choose whom you will yield unto, choose whom you will serve; what doth your heart answer unto him?

23. Q. Is it your purpose to engage to all the articles of the covenant in borrowed strength, wholly distrusting your own strength and resolutions ; and resolving to trust, not in your promise to Christ, but in Christ's promise to you, that he "will never leave you nor forsake you?"

24. Q. Do you resolve to live a life of prayer and acquaintance with Christ all your days, that you will always run to God, and consult him in all cases?

25. Q. Are you resolved also to live a life of faith and dependence daily on the Son of God for his righteousness to cover guilt, for his strength to perform duty, conquer sin, resist temptation, bear crosses and afflictions?

26. Q. Are you resolved to make ordinances always trysting-places between Christ and you, and to look still for a meeting with him in every one of them, and to count every sabbath and sermon as lost, wherein you miss his presence?

27. Q. Are you resolved to engage to all these articles in a secret transaction and personal covenant with God, before you come to his table; and then to come in a solemn way to seal and ratify this bargain and covenant before men and angels at his table?

Thus let ministers take pains to instruct young people in the nature and articles of the covenant of grace, and to take them engaged, with some solemnity, to own and adhere to them, at their first admission to the Lord's supper; and let them, with solemn and fervent prayer, recommend and give up these young communicants unto the Lord; such a course hath been found, by experience, very much to contribute to the welfare and prosperity of the church.

4. It would be for the honour and interest of the church to have our sermons to the people flowing from the heart, i. e., for us to be suitably affected and impressed with the truths we deliver to them. A speculative preacher, that preacheth merely from strength of parts, doth not much good, because his light hath no heart accompanying it. That which cometh only from the head, commonly reacheth no further than the head: but that which cometh from the heart is most likely to reach to the heart. The best way to bring our people to believe and be affected with our doctrine, is, to let them see that we believe it, and are affected with it ourselves. Such a preacher was Paul, who "preached and warned his hearers with tears," Acts xx. 31; Phil. iii. 18. He knew the strongest reasons and arguments, proposed without affection and warmth, would not prevail: nay, a blunt iron, if hot, will sooner pierce the wood, than a sharper iron that is cold. Our famous countryman, Mr. John Livingstone—who was a happy instrument, in God's hand, of converting many souls, perhaps some hundreds at one sermon—tells, in his life, that the times when he was most successful, were, when he got his own heart in the most lively, warm, and tender frame, before he went to the pulpit.

5. If we would promote the credit and welfare of the church, let us be diligent to know the state of our flocks, inquire into their cases, and look after the fruits of our sermons amongst them. And, for this end, let us frequently visit them in their houses, and thereby give them occasion to lay open their cases to us; and let us improve these times by examination and instruction; for they are apt to forget what we say to them, if we do not cause them speak something relative to the subject themselves. Therefore, let us ask them concerning their proficiency by the word, and what they remember of the sermon they lately heard, and of the bible and other books which they have read, and what impressions these things made upon them? If they be convinced of the evil of sin, and be humbled for it; and of the necessity of duty, and be excited to it, by what they hear or read? And let us give them advices how to hear and read more profitably for the future. Thus let us go from house to house, like the apostle Paul, to see how our people do, warning every one as we see occasion for it. Let us act the part of good gardeners, who, after they have sown their seeds, look after the springing thereof, water some beds in time of drought, and pluck up the noxious weeds; likewise it is fit we should frequently look after our examine-rolls in our closets, to bring the various cases of our people to our remembrance, that we may mind them in our prayers, and prepare suitable doctrine for them.

6. If we would promote the credit and prosperity of our mother-church, let us be frequent in dispensing the holy supper amongst our people. Our infrequency in this service is a reproach to us among foreign churches, as well as a real loss to the souls committed to our charge. If ever our people attend to what they hear, or get benefit by the gospel, it is most commonly about the time of a sacrament, and when they are making preparation for it. Though this be not a converting ordinance to the receivers, in the very nature of it, but strengthening and confirming, yet sermons and discourses about this time, upon the melting subject of a crucified Jesus, have been the means of converting many thousands. Besides, the frequent dispensing of this soul-affecting ordinance, would be a good way to keep up the remembrance of God, of Christ, and of heaven, among our people; and to keep up the impressions of the evil of sin, the worth of souls, the love of God, in giving his Son to the world, and the love of Christ in dying for us. Likewise, it would be a good mean to help the carelessness of our people's minds, the weakness of their memories, the dullness of their capacities, and their small proficiency in knowledge: for in this ordinance they have a compendious and affecting view of the whole scheme of the Christian religion at once; they have man's fall and disease, together with his remedy and recovery, set forth to the life and in such a way as to make impressions upon their outward senses. And, further, would we have our people effectually engaged to family worship, secret prayer, and a tender walk? Would we have swearing, minced oaths, sabbath-breaking, and other vices, kept under constant rebukes? Would we conquer these evils which prevail among our people? let us frequently set before their eyes the bleeding wounds of a crucified Jesus, those sin-killing objects, as represented in the holy sacrament. We have no better way than this to advance the glory of our Redeemer, and the salvation of our people's souls; and, seeing we have so short a time for doing either, we have need to bestir ourselves. Nay, my brethren, as ye would desire to keep glorious Christ in perpetual esteem, sin in continual disgrace, the world in lasting contempt, religion in constant credit among men; and as you would desire to retrieve the honour of this national church, and wipe off her reproach, I beseech you to administer the Lord's supper oftener than once in the year, in your congregations.

7. As I would have you frequent in the administration, so I would have you strict in the admission to it. Our Confession of Faith declares it to be a great sin in ministers to admit either ignorant or ungodly persons to the Lord's table. It is incumbent on us, therefore, to look well out, that we do not admit any swearer, drunkard, sabbath-breaker, evil-speaker, malicious person, or any other guilty of any scandalous sin, to eat of these holy things; procul hinc, procul inde profani! It would be a means to dart home convictions and awaking thoughts upon sinners, to find themselves excluded from this holy ordinance for want of family worship, for idle walking on the Lord's day, for malicious words or actions, for excessive drinking, for abusing of God's name, for using petty oaths, as, by faith, conscience, &c. And good reason have we to exclude such, seeing the Spirit of God distinguisheth between the precious and the vile, by the characters of "him that sweareth, and him that feareth an oath," Eccl. ix. 2. And surely they who use minced oaths, can never be ranked among them that fear an oath. I myself have the experience of several persons, who have been thankful to me for keeping them back from such things, because the dispensation had been blessed for humbling and reforming them.

Object. 1. It is hard to discover persons who may be guilty of some of these evils.

Ans. 1. Let us endeavour to get faithful and conscientious elders, who will impartially inform us of our people's manners; and, if we want such, let us be willing to take information from others. 2. Let us question the consciences of those whom we suspect as guilty of any of these practices, and they may be brought to confess them.

Object. 2. We will be in hazard of disobliging many of our people by such strictness.

Ans. 1. We may edify men, and promote their soul's interest, even when we displease them; 2. Better displease men, than him who is our great master and judge. 3. Let us take pains to convince our people of the awful charge given to us, as the stewards of God's house, who must give the children's bread to the dogs. As Jehoiada of old set porters at the gates of the house of the Lord, "that none who was unclean in any thing should enter in," 2 Chron. xxiii. 19, so God hath set us ministers as porters to the holy table of the Lord, that no profane sinner, nor swearer, no malicious person, no prayerless man, no man that harbours any known sin, and is unwilling to part with it may approach to it. As the cherubims stood at the entry of paradise with a drawn sword, to keep Adam from entering in to eat the tree of life; so ministers are to stand with the sword of the Lord's threatenings brandished against every impenitent sinner, every swearer, every drunkard, liar, every Sabbath-breaker, every backbiter, and hater of his neighbour, every neglecter of family worship or secret prayer, that they do not presume to rush upon this holy ordinance, while they continue in any of these sins. This strictness is necessary for the welfare and reputation of our church, and to wipe away reproach.

8. As we would consult the credit and safety of this church, let us consider well whom we appoint for our successors in office; i. e., let us take care whom we license and ordain, that they be men of piety, prudence, and parts, men that will exert themselves for the glory of God, and for winning of the souls of the rising generation, that we may have ground to hope that religion will be entailed to succeeding ages. We see how strictly the apostle enjoined "Timothy to commit the ministry to faithful men, to lay hands suddenly on no man, not to be partakers of other men's sins, but keep himself pure," 1 Tim. v. 22; 2 Tim. ii. 2. These commands also oblige us to see that those whom we bring into the holy ministry be faithful men, according to the best of our discerning; men who have pure and honest ends in their undertaking; and not those who aim more to win a livelihood to themselves, than to win souls to Christ, or those who will take unwarrantable methods to thrust themselves into parishes, by courting patrons, or accepting their presentations ; a practice which no law requires, a practice which manifestly tends to bring a corrupt ministry into the church, and which hath already brought in great divisions and confusions into this poor church. If patronage be a yoke and grievance to the church of God, as we all profess to own, it must surely be a sin for men, by their own voluntary deed, to bring on that grievance, and to wreathe that yoke about the church's neck ; when at the same time they know they are under no necessity from the law to do so, seeing parishes can be planted otherwise, if our preachers would give way to it.

Our present situation is so easy, by the act of parliament, 1719, that patronage can do this church no harm, without the active concurrence of a preacher. Well, then, hath the legislature been so kind as to unstring the patronage-act, and so tender of this church's liberties, as to leave her freedom at her own choice ; what a shame will it be, in that case, if her own preachers shall turn her oppressors ? O tell it not in Gath ! &c. But, seeing the plain and free warnings emitted by this and neighbouring synods, set the sin and danger of this practice in so clear a light, I need add no more upon it, except by earnest prayer to God, that he may bless these means, so as to put a stop to this most pernicious practice. Amen.

9. As we would desire the welfare of this church, and prevent her reproach, let us endeavour, as far as possible, to get parishes planted with their own consent and good liking : for, when this is done against their will, it frequently hath a woful issue ; congregations are broken, ordinances are forsaken, Christ's flock is dispersed, and the ministry is despised ; all which very much tend to our reproach, as well as the hindrance of the kingdom of Christ. Wherefore, my dear brethren, let us take heed what we do in this affair, seeing so much depends upon it.

There is a controversy very lately risen amongst us, concerning the people's right to elect their pastors : some take it wholly from them, and give it to the presbytery or church-representative ; and the church's friends are distracted by writings on both sides. If I may offer my opinion, I humbly apprehend the state of the controversy is not duly considered by those who handle it. And many of our differences and disputes proceed from our not stating the question so distinctly and accurately as we should ; and, when this is once done, frequently the debate falls.

The question, then, ought not to be stated generally and confusedly, as, whether the people or the presbytery have the right of electing the pastors of the church ? seeing we may safely grant they both have an interest therein, the one without prejudice to the other. Neither is the question to be stated, whether the presbytery or church-representative have a power to elect and ordain pastors, upon some occasions, and for some special employments and services, without the choice and consent of the people ? As, for my part, I believe they have ; and that these pastors, so elected, are lawful pastors of the catholic church, and ought to be acknowledged as such by the people. Nor is the question to be stated, whether the presbytery hath any power at all in the election of pastors to particular parishes ? No, for it is owned they have a great power, in conjunction with the parishes, and ought to preside in the election. But, if the question be stated whether the presbytery hath the sole power of electing, exclusive of the voice or consent of the parishes to which the pastors are elected ? They who espouse that side of the question, in my humble opinion, will have a hard pull to prove it, either from scripture, reason, or fathers. And, that they may know what they had to do, let the question be clearly and distinctly stated, as it ought to be, in a suitableness to the present situation of this church, and then it will run thus :

Quest. "Whether the presbytery, or church-representative, hath a right to elect and appoint pastors to particular flocks of Christian people, without the call or consent of these flocks, and even when they dissent and reclaim against their deed ? And, whether, in such cases, the presbytery hath power to constitute and fix the spiritual and pastoral relation between these pastors and these flocks, so that they must necessarily acknowledge them as their proper pastors, and receive all ordinances from them : yea, be tied to them so much, that they cannot have access, without the allowance of these pastors, to partake of sealing ordinances dispensed by others ? So that all these Christian people, however valuable they be, must be in effect excommunicated, if they do not receive these pastors imposed violently upon them ?" Now, if the controversy be thus stated among us, as it certainly ought to be, the writers for the presbytery's power will find it a difficult task to instruct and support such a power from the word of God, sound reason, or the practice of the primitive church ; nay, I am of the mind, all the three will be found to unite against them, seeing all of them declare for the great interest which Christians have in the choice and settlement of those who are to be their spiritual guides, and that they are to be consulted in this important affair. Our most eminent divines, both abroad and at home, have, ever since the reformation, strenuously argued for the people's right against the papists and their clergy's imposing power, from the word of God, and particularly from Acts i. 15, 23, 26 ; vi. 2, 3, 5, 6 ; xiv. 23, whose arguments I have not yet seen satisfactorily answered, either by Papist or Protestant. But, besides all these, it may satisfy any unbiassed inquirer, if he but consider the characters which Christ gives his flock, that, "they hear and know his voice in his shepherds," and distinguish it from the voice of false shepherds, and "will not follow these, but flee from them." John x. 3—5, and the command that is given to all Christians to "try the spirits," 1 John iv. 1, and to "beware of false prophets, which come to them in sheep's clothing," Mat. vii. 15, and to "mark and avoid these who teach unsound doctrine," Rom. xvi. 17, 18; Phil. iii. 2; and to judge of the doctrine which is delivered to them by their teachers, 1 Cor. x. 15, and, for doing whereof, the Bereans are highly commended by the Spirit of God, Acts xvii. 11. I say, it may satisfy every unprejudiced person that seriously considers these scripture-texts, and the commands given to the disciples of Christ therein, that the word of God allows a great interest to all judicious Christians in the choice of their pastors; and that it is their unquestionable right and privilege to have a judgment of discretion concerning these pastors, to whom they are bound to commit the guiding, edification, and instruction, of their precious souls: and no patron, no heritor, no body of men, or judicatory whatsoever, can deprive the people of that right and privilege which God allows to them.

But, granting the scripture had mentioned nothing of the people's right in this matter, but had given all power to the presbytery, as some would have it, and left them to manage it, as they should be answerable to their great Lord and Master: yet, even in that case, I think it easy to demonstrate, from the general rules of the word, and the dictates of sound reason, that presbyteries ought always to exercise their electing and planting power, with the advice and consent of the Christian congregations immediately concerned, and not in opposition to their declared inclinations and pressing requests. I shall mention two plain scripture-rules which determine me to think so, viz., that in 1 Cor. x. 31, "Whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." And that in 1 Cor. xiv. 26, "Let all things be done unto edifying." Now, ministers are more concerned to observe these rules than other men, seeing their office is peculiarly designed for advancing the glory of God, and the edification of this church. And is it not evident to every rational sober mind, that it is more for the glory of God and the edification of the church, to settle pastors in congregations with their own consent and good-liking, than to thrust them in upon them against their will? When we plant ministers amongst a people, whose persons they esteem, and whose ministry they affect, they will more readily hearken to their instructions.

submit to their reproofs, and obey their directions, than they will do theirs against whom they have conceived the strongest aversion and prejudice. The settling of parishes in a violent manner steps the success of the gospel, and defeats the great and valuable ends of a gospel ministry, which are mainly these two, (1.) The conversion of sinners, and reconciling them to God, Acts xxvi. 18; 2 Cor. v. 20. (2.) The perfecting of the saints, and edifying of the body of Christ, Eph. iv. 12. Now, how can any of these noble ends be reached by such ministers, when either the people do not attend their ministry at all, or, if they do, yet their grudges or prejudices against them, woefully shut their ears against all their instructions and admonitions? O, if gospel-ministers would more closely attend and pursue these great ends of their ministry, the groans of the oppressed would not so much afflict us, as they are likely more and more to do, if God in his tender mercy prevent not. I grant church authority is not to be despised; for God hath clothed his ministers with spiritual power and authority in his church: but still we are to remember, when we exercise this power in any case, we ought to do it for edification, and not for destruction, 2 Cor. x. 8; xiii. 10. We are not to be lords over God's heritage, to do as we list; nor are we to exercise any dominion over their faith or consciences, but we are to promote their comfort and joy, 2 Pet. v. 3; 2 Cor. i. 24. The church's edification is the great rule and end of all church power. We see how closely the apostle Paul kept this rule in his eye, in all the exercise of his church power and authority, 2 Cor. xii. 19, "We do all things, dearly beloved, for your edifying." He regarded the edification, not only of the rich and great, but also of the poorest saints, and the meanest members of the body of Christ; and surely, the edification of such is not below the consideration of the most eminent ministers, or the greatest judicatory of Christ's house. We see what regard Christ had to his little ones, and what wrath he threatens against these who offend them, Mat. xviii. 6; Luke xvii. 2.

Well, then, my brethren, let us have a tender regard to these scripture-rules I have mentioned, in all our actings in judicatories, and especially with respect to the settlement of churches; and if there be any act or rule in this church, particularly that lately made, which hath any thing in it inconsistent with the foresaid rules, as indeed there seems to be, according to the sense now put upon it, I earnestly wish and pray, that all my reverend brethren may resolve upon addressing the venerable assembly in the most decent and dutiful manner, that they may be pleased to rectify it, so as it may better answer the great ends we ought all to have in view, the glory of God and the edification of the body of Christ. And this I move, without any design to reflect upon the authority of the assembly, which we ought to treat with all due regard, or to give any offence; and neither should any take it, seeing there is none of our courts that pretend to infallibility; as they have altered, so they still can alter their acts and rules when they see good reason for it. And the administration we live under, blessed be God, is so mild and gentle, that we have liberty to address our superiors, both civil and ecclesiastic, concerning what is grievous to us: and why should we not improve our liberty in addressing both of them, for removing whatever hinders the advancement of the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, to whose service we ministers are peculiarly devoted?

10. If we would promote this church's welfare, and prevent her reproach, let us join fasting, weeping, and mourning, together with our prayers; as we are directed both in text and context, Joel ii. 12, "Let us weep betwixt the porch and the altar," in sight of all the people, and bewail those sins and backslidings which grieve God, and provoke him to give up this church to reproach. And, amongst others of our sins, we have cause to confess and lament our impenitency, and neglect of observing days of fasting and humiliation for our own sins, and the sins of the land and church of which we are members and office-bearers. Alas, what a bad token is it! when judgments are visibly impending over us, that there is so little of an inclination or willingness to appoint and keep such days with our people, for enumerating, confessing, and spreading out our heinous and God-provoking sins before the Lord, such as our ignorance, unbelief, atheism, unthankfulness, unfruitfulness, treacherous dealing, &c. See a more full enumeration of our sins in the postscript of this discourse.

11. If we would advance the church's credit, and avert her reproach, let us all be careful to preach to our people by our lives as well as by our lips, to confirm our doctrine in the pulpit by our conversation out of it. Let us mind, that a loose way of living will soon demolish all that is built by the most lively way of preaching; for our people have eyes to see how we walk, as well as ears to hear what we say. Hence it was that the apostle Paul gave such a weighty advice to Timothy, a young minister, 1 Tim. iv. 12, "Be thou an example of the believers, in word, in conversation, in charity, in spirit, in faith, in purity." And as the apostle advised others, so he lived himself: observe how he appeals to the Thessalonians, among whom he had laboured, concerning the exactness and exemplariness of his ministerial walk, 1 Thes. ii. 10, "You are witnesses, and God also, how holily, and justly, and unblameably we behaved ourselves among you that believe." And this holy and shining conversation of the apostle contributed much to the success of his doctrine. Alas, shining doctrine, without a shining walk, will never enlighten nor enliven our hearers. If, after we have preached against pride, passion, covetousness, injustice, intemperance, lightness, unchastity, contention, uncharitableness, unmercifulness, malice, revenge, &c., we ourselves should be found guilty of any of these evils; if we be worldly, intemperate, malicious, unjust, contentious, or unmerciful; if we be light or frothy; if any corrupt communication proceeded out of our mouths; then we just pull down with the one hand what we build up with the other. We tempt people to think we do not ourselves believe what we would persuade them to believe; that we only talk of these things because it is our trade, and we get our living by it. It is not easy to express the mischievous influence which looseness in a minister's walk hath upon the interests of religion amongst a people; hence it is that the Spirit of God saith to ministers, Isa. lii. 11, "Be ye clean that bear the vessels of the Lord." And Christ saith to his disciples, who were designed to be ministers, Mat. v. 16, "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works." It adds greatly to the credit and prosperity of a church, when her ministers have holy and shining conversations; whereas it exposeth her to sad reproach when it is otherwise. "Lord, give not up thy heritage in Scotland to this reproach."

Quest. When may it be said that a minister's conversation is of a shining character? and how shall we attain to it?

Ans. In order thereto, let us, 1. Study meekness, patience, and peaceableness of spirit; and, when we meet with provocations, let us labour to rule our spirits and keep reason upon the throne. Let us neither be soon angry, nor long angry. To be patient under reproaches and bad usage, and ready to forgive injuries, is such a sweet Christian disposition, as would very much adorn our character. That is a noble advice the apostle gives, 2 Tim. ii. 24, 25, "The servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient; in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves."

2. Let us study justice and righteousness in all our dealings with others, even to a shoe latchet, that we may be able to appeal to our people, with the prophet Samuel, Whom have we injured or wronged? So Paul appeals to the Thessalonians with respect to his just dealing among them, 1 Thes. ii. 10. The least appearance of injustice or unfair dealing in a minister, is most reproachful to his character, and exceedingly mars his success; and therefore the apostle directs the man of God to be just, and follow after righteousness, 1 Tim. vi. 11; Tit. i. 8.

3. Let us be clothed with humility, which is a shining ornament in a minister's conversation. We are not to be puffed up with our parts or attainments, or to despise those who fall short of us; but we must be willing to become all things to all men, and servants to every one, for the good of their souls. And thus we would resemble our Master who was meek and lowly, and taught us by his example to humble ourselves to serve one another. It has been observed, that God uses to bless the labours of those of meaner parts, who are humble and diligent, when those of greater parts, who are lifted up, are blasted.

4. Temperance, sobriety, and chastity, are very adorning to a minister's walk. He ought to have power over his appetite to restrain it, as to eating or drinking, and never to be enslaved to any base lust, Tit. i. 7, 8; 2 Tim. ii. 22.

5. If we would adorn our character, let us be disengaged from the world as much as may be, that we may attend our spiritual work of serving God, and winning of souls without distraction. Our eyes should not be dazzled with the glittering lustre of gold and silver, but we ought to show a generous contempt of these things, as those who firmly believe the great and everlasting things of that world we preach to others, and unto which we press men to elevate their minds and affections. What a reproach is it to those who preach this doctrine to others, and live contrary to it themselves?

6. Let us study, when we converse with others, to mix something that is spiritual and edifying. We are called the salt of the earth, and therefore ought to season the places and companies where we are, with some savoury and useful discourse; this is much better than foolish talking and jesting, which is not convenient for those of our character, Eph. v. 4. For a minister to have nothing of God, of Christ, of heaven, or of serious godliness in his mouth, but when he is in the pulpit, is an evidence that he is not very zealous to promote the great ends of his office, the glory of God and the salvation of men's souls; for, if he were, out of the abundance of the heart the mouth would speak, and be ready to drop something now and then to the honour of God, and the confirmation of those truths we deliver in public.

Thus I have mentioned several things that would make a minister's conversation of a shining character; which, if studied, would tend very much to promote the reputation and welfare of this church, and to avert her reproach. And, having said so much to my brethren of the ministry, I shall now conclude with,

A WORD TO THE PEOPLE.

LET me exhort you to join with ministers in this necessary work of weeping and wrestling for the church of God, and especially for his heritage in the land of your nativity. Though the command in the text be directed to ministers, yet elsewhere we find it directed to the people of all ranks, Psal. cxxii. 6. Pray for the peace of Jerusalem; they shall prosper that love thee. Well, then, let me beseech you all to weep, and cry with us, "spare thy people, O Lord, and give not thine heritage to reproach." And with your tears and prayers see that ye join your most earnest endeavours to promote the credit and welfare of the church, according to the station wherein God hath set you. 1. Are ye magistrates? Exact yourselves, both by your authority and example, to discourage vice and immorality. 2. Are ye elders? See to assist ministers by reproving sin, and informing against it. 3. Are ye teachers of youth? Labour to instil the principles of religion and virtue into the young generation very early, and train them up in the abhorrence of vice, and whatever hath a tendency to it. 4. Are ye parents and heads of families? See that young ones be taught both to read and pray; catechise both children and servants upon the Sabbath evening; call them to an account of what they remember of the sermons they have heard; perform family-worship with them in all its parts: be careful to reprove sin, such as lying, swearing, Sabbath-breaking, neglect of prayer, &c. And whatever be your walk or station in the world, I exhort you to set apart time for mourning and weeping for your own sins, and the sins of the land, which may provoke the Lord to leave us, and give us up to reproach. Pray for the ministers which are planted among you; and pray earnestly for a faithful soul-winning ministry to be raised up in the church, and planted in vacant congregations; and that all impediments in the way may be removed, and the incoming of a corrupt ministry prevented, pray that the Spirit of God may be poured down from on high upon us and all our endeavours, which would retrieve the credit of the church, and avert her reproach. Amen.

POSTSCRIPT.

CONTAINING AN ENUMERATION OF SOME SINS TO BE CONFESSED AND MOURNED OVER, UPON FAST-DAYS, AND OTHER OCCASIONS.

1. THE abounding atheism of many in the land, both in heart and life: the practical atheism of those who live as if there were no God nor Providence to govern the world, who put the creatures, the world, and self in God's room, and ascribe their mercies to fortune, their own wisdom, and industry, rather than to God.

2. The gross immoralities which abound among us, as drunkenness, uncleanness, lying, backbiting, defrauding, profane swearing, false swearing in matters of commerce, profaning the Lord's day, by walking and travelling unnecessarily, transporting goods, and otherwise.

3. Our woful security in these evils, and obstinate cleaving to predominant sins, despising all reproofs for them, and warnings to forsake them.

4. The inordinate setting of our hearts upon earthly enjoyments and sensual satisfaction, to the sad neglect of these things wherein our chief happiness consists, viz., the enjoying of God, and communion with him.

5. The great ignorance of God and of gospel truths, which continueth in a land of such light. The great ignorance of Jesus Christ, of his mediation and offices, and of the way of making use of Christ for justification and sanctification, for strength in duties, and for access to and acceptance with God.

6. The neglect of the worship of God in families, and in secret, and the great restraining of prayer before God.

7. Our unfruitfulness under the means of grace.

8. The backslidings of all ranks from God, and leaving their first love; the great decay of the life and power of godliness, and of holy and tender walking, both in ministers and professors.

9. The sloth and contempt of many, in not attending upon God's holy ordinances.

10. Our attending ordinances for the fashion, and not making them places for meeting with God, and means of communion with him.

11. Our contenting ourselves with man's teaching, and not seeking after the teachings and influences of the Spirit in hearing of the word.

12. Our sinning away the Holy Spirit from ordinances; our not lamenting for his withdrawing or wrestling for his return.

13. Our formality in prayer, and not making use of the intercession of Christ, nor employing the assistance of the Spirit in this duty.

14. Our resting upon an outward attendance of ordinances, and a name to live, without seeking after a work of grace and regeneration in our souls.

15. Our not valuing the news of redeeming love which the gospel brings to us, nor embracing glorious Christ as offered to us therein.

16. Our not living a life of faith upon Christ, nor making continual use of his meritorious blood and imputed righteousness for our justification, sanctification, subduing sin, performing duty, acceptance with God and peace of conscience.

17. Our going about to establish our own righteousness, by putting our religious duties, our just dealing, or moral honesty, in the room of glorious Christ, who alone is the Lord our righteousness.

18. Our unfrequency and sloth in celebrating the memorials of redeeming love, and of the death and sufferings of our blessed Lord, in the holy supper.

19. The profanation of the Lord's table, by the approach of those who are ignorant, prayerless, or ungodly liver.

20. Our neglecting solemn preparation for this near approach, by self-examination, secret humiliation, and wrestling with God for his presence, and renewing covenant with him.

21. Our not keeping up the impression of sacramental vows, and of the matchless love of Christ displayed to us, so as to be thereby constrained to live to him that died for us.

22. Our not imitating the pattern of the holy Jesus in his meekness, holiness, self-denial, mortification to the world, patience under wrongs, thankfulness for mercies, diligence in prayer, zeal for God's service, concern for the good of others, willingness to die, and resignation to God's will.

23. The neglect of masters and families in instructing their children and servants, and using their authorities to suppress sin amongst them.

24. Our unthankful forgetting of the many signal deliverances which God hath wrought for this church and land; and our unthankful abuse of the many valuable mercies we still enjoy.

25. Our perfidious dealing with God, in breaking both national and personal covenant; and our want of zeal for maintaining truth, purity, and piety, in opposition to abounding error, superstition and profanity.

26. Our indifferency about the coming of Christ's kingdom; our little praying for the peace and prosperity of Jerusalem; and our minding our own things more than the things of Jesus Christ.

27. The heaven-daring attacks made upon the gospel revelation, by infidels among ourselves.

28. Our impenitency and insensibility under spiritual judgments, and manifold tokens of God's anger, such as, withdrawing his Spirit from ministers and professors, blasting of ordinances, dividing us in his anger, giving us up to spiritual oppression and persecution, letting loose a spirit of error and delusion, &c.

POPERY ANOTHER GOSPEL.

PREFACE.

THE British constitution, and its established laws and liberties, are things most valuable, which our ancestors have all along contended for, and sometimes at the expense of blood and treasure. Every body abroad, that knows our constitution, admires it, and envies our distinguished happiness, because of our civil liberties in Britain, where the inhabitants have security to possess, in ease and quiet, the fruits of their own industry, or the inheritances of their fathers or relations, without being subject to the pillage or oppression of arbitrary lords or superiors, or to the exorbitant demands of lawless princes; and where no tax or burden can be laid upon them, but by the advice and consent of such representatives as are nominated and elected by themselves. No wonder then though every true Briton be anxiously concerned in time of danger, for preserving these liberties to themselves, and for handing them safe down to posterity.

But as the soul is preferable to the body, so our pure bible-religion, our gospel-worship, and ordinances with freedom of conscience, are of far greater value to us than any secular blessing whatsoever; and consequently worthy of all the blood and treasure we have to expend for their preservation. Now, when both our civil and sacred interests, even all that is dear to us as men and Christians, is threatened and attacked at once, as we see it is by the present unnatural rebellion; how can any British Protestant be easy, or look on the danger with an eye of indifference?

There are many excellent papers, published since the commencement of this rebellion, in behalf of our civil rights and privileges struck at thereby: but seeing it belongs to one in my sphere to be chiefly concerned about our religious interests, which appear to be equally in danger, I judged it seasonable to essay in some sermons to demonstrate the verity, purity, and scripture-foundation of the Protestant reformed religion, which we profess; and also the absurdity, blasphemy, idolatry, treachery, cruelty, and antichristian foundation of the Popish religion, which these nations are threatened with; and that in order to confirm Protestants, and quicken their zeal to maintain their holy religion against the attempts of Rome and her abettors, and to use all lawful and warrantable means, both spiritual and temporal, for that end.

The books already written against Popery are both innumerable and unanswerable; but, many of them being large and scholastic, I have abridged the controversy in a few sermons in plain language, for the advantage of those who may not have time or capacity to read or comprehend larger volumes; and these I have published for undeceiving the simple, into whom Jacobite Protestants would fain instil more favourable notions of Popery than what is just, in order to pave the way for their setting up a Popish king over them. It is necessary then to countermine them, by setting Popery in a true light, that Protestants may keep up their abhorrence of it. For, where their abhorrence of Popery decreases, their Jacobitism is fair to increase. O, if Scottish Protestants had maintained the zeal of their fathers against Popery, Jacobitism had not spread so in the land, nor had the present rebellion found such encouragement as it hath done. Our fathers still looked upon Popery as the religion and device of antichrist, and not as the institution of Jesus Christ. And if Jacobite Protestants would allow themselves to think calmly, without partiality or bias, upon the Popish tenets, they would soon drop their favourable thoughts of Popery, and be obliged to own that Popery is not Christianity, but antichristianity; and the establishment of it would prove the establishment of irreligion and vice, and the rooting out of both Christianity and morality; the difference between the Protestant and Popish religion being the same that is between light and darkness, between certain truths and gross absurdities, between spiritual worship and gross idolatry, between heavenly benevolence and diabolical cruelty, between Jesus Christ the light of the world, and Satan the prince of darkness: and that therefore it is most just to hate Popery, that mystery of iniquity, and carefully to avoid it, and whatever has a tendency to introduce it among us. "But," say they, "Papists hold the essentials of Christianity, why then should we keep at such a distance from them?" To which I answer, they hold other principles which subvert these essentials which they profess, and therefore we should avoid them as we do those who have the plague. A man that hath the plague hath the essentials of a man, and yet we flee from him, because he hath the plague. Alas! Papists are overrun with a most infectious plague of damnable error and idolatry, as is evident from the following sermons; and therefore God calls us to separate from them.

How astonishing is it then, that any who own themselves Protestants should take up arms against a Protestant king, and shed Protestant blood, for introducing a Popish government, and for overturning a Protestant administration, under which, subjects of all sorts have enjoyed the greatest liberty for fifty-eight years; and where, in room of it, they must expect nothing but Popery, tyranny, and slavery! And shall Scottish Protestants be so absurd and infatuated! Is not this to make Scotland a reproach and disgrace to Protestants! yea, a hissing and astonishment to all the Protestant world! Is there any Protestant nation, or body of Protestants upon the face of the earth, that would go with Jacobite Protestants, and fight under the banner of anti-christ, against the religion of Jesus Christ their Saviour, which they profess! O, it were better that these who are Papists in heart, would throw off the mask, honestly declare what they are, and no more disgrace the Protestant name.

"But," say they, "the king we fight for, is wiser than to meddle with our religion; nay, he hath promised, and would come under the most solemn obligations to maintain the Protestant religion among us."

Ans. So indeed did his supposed father, as sundry Popish princes have done, but soon forgot these obligations afterwards. It is the greatest folly for Protestants to trust those whose religion teaches and avows the breaking of faith to heretics.

"But," say they, "the king we would have, is now made wiser by dear-bought experience, than others, and would not be imposed on by the Pope or papists to ruin himself, by seeking to alter our religion, or to establish Popery: for, having seen his father's wrong steps, and the fatal consequences of them to him and his posterity, he would be careful to avoid them, for securing his throne in time to come."

Ans. If he is a thorough papist, as doubtless he is, he must look on all these wrong steps of his father as good works, and the consequences to him not unhappy, but full of merit, and to be desired by every good Catholic. Why? He must believe that these have exalted him to sit among the most powerful and glorious saints in heaven, and those who are intitled to worship and adoration by all below.—And why should not one of his principles be ambitious to follow his steps, and obtain his high honours in heaven, as he is now ambitious to obtain his fading crown on earth?

Again, were Jacobites so numerous and powerful in the land, as to raise the pretender to the throne; what would we have to fear from such subjects? What should hinder him from establishing Popery, when they give their king an uncontrollable power above the laws? It is their declared principle, that there is an absolute and unlimited power in the king, and he is answerable to none for what he doth, but to God Almighty. Whereas an absolute power or unlimited authority over rational creatures, is one of the prerogatives peculiar to the great Sovereign of heaven and earth; and for any mortal to usurp or claim it, is high treason against him who is King eternal, immortal, &c.—And would not these professed principles of subjects give great encouragement to a Romish bigot to dispense with the laws in favour of the Protestant religion, and declare himself for Popery; especially, seeing he must believe Protestants to be the pests of human society, and that he is bound in conscience to extirpate the Protestant religion under the pain of damnation, and to obey his spiritual sovereign the Pope in what concerns the catholic cause; who he believes can absolve him from all oaths, promises, or engagements, that may be prejudicial to it?

No doubt but some Popish princes may be wise and considerate, generous and good-natured, as well as Protestant princes; but, wherever the interest of their religion comes to be concerned, their sanguinary zeal for it comes to be too strong for their good nature and humanity, and frequently an over-match for their reason and interest too; so that Protestants can never trust them. They may promise what they will, but they cannot perform what they will; their consciences being in another man's keeping, to whom they stand solemnly engaged, as their infallible guide in religious matters: they may be permitted to swear what they please, but they must not be allowed to keep their oaths, if heresy be concerned; for, in that case, the Pope, the guide of their consciences, will declare it a good work and highly meritorious to break them, and absolve them from all oaths and obligations whatsoever. For it is a thing notorious, that Papists reckon it a mortal sin to favour heresy, or preserve the Protestant religion, when they have power and opportunity to destroy it: and how can a prince who is a bigoted papist think of dying under the guilt of such a mortal sin?

When Jacobites are driven from all their other pretexts, they flee to their strong hold of a hereditary right by birth and blood, which they say is divine and indefeasible; concerning which, I would intreat them to consider a few things.

1. I would remind them that the house of Stuart came to the throne, not by hereditary right, but by the choice and consent of the parliament and people; seeing it is well known that Baliol and his heirs, whom they rejected, descended from the eldest daughter of the royal family, and so had the hereditary right according to our law; and not Bruce, from whom the Stuarts are sprung, who descended from the younger sister: but the Scotch nation judged that Baliol, by his unworthy behaviour, justly forfeited the crown, and Bruce was far more deserving of it. Our ancestors then were of the same mind with our fathers at the late happy revolution, that salus populi est suprema lex; and that princes were made for the good of nations, and not nations for the honour and glory of princes; and that the hereditary right of princes was alterable, and not indefeasible.

2. Supposing the Stuarts had descended from the eldest daughter, as they did not, it would not prove their right to the crown to be divine or indefeasible; for, we read often of God's passing by the eldest in families, and pitching upon the younger to govern, as in the case of Judah, Saul, David, &c. Likewise, under the New Testament times, our Lord Jesus Christ was far from judging this hereditary right essential to a lawful government; for we find him, Mat. xxii. 21, instructing the Jews to be obedient unto Cæsar, or the Roman emperor, to whom the Jewish nation had subjected themselves. Now Tiberius Cæsar, then upon the throne, to whom he would have them continue obedient, was not the next in blood to Augustus, whom he succeeded in the empire, but a man of another family, son of Tiberius Nero, whose wife only Augustus had married, and out of favour named him in his will to succeed him, though he had a grandson of his own then alive, and a great-grandson too. Now, if Augustus' nearest heirs in blood had a right divine and indefeasible, no mortal could have set them aside by his mere arbitrary will; neither would Christ have taught obedience to Tiberius who had not this birth-claim, saying, "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's." Jacobites, according to their principles, must hold Tiberius to have been a usurper; yet Christ approves his title, as being owned and submitted to by the nation, so far as to enjoin tribute and obedience to him. Likewise the apostle Paul, after Christ's example, enjoins obedience and tribute to the succeeding emperors, Rom. xiii. who had no more title to the empire by birth than Tiberius had.

From all which instances, it is manifest, that an hereditary right to government is not of divine appointment, but only the ordinance and appointment of men for the general good of mankind; and, being such, why may it not be altered by men when they find it ceases to be for their good, as sometimes it doth? So our ancestors found it in the days of Baliol and James VII. For to maintain that this hereditary right is unalterable in any case, is inconsistent with reason and the light of nature, as well as with the word of God; and would overthrow the right of the house of Stuart as well as others. How absurd is it to say, that any man and his heirs have a divine and indefeasible right to rule over and dispose of nations with their lives and fortunes uncontrollably, as they have of disposing of their cattle or other goods! This were to degrade rational creatures into the rank of brutes. Yea, it would amount to blasphemy, to maintain that a man hath such a right from God, a right that cannot be set aside on any account, not for the most outrageous tyranny, barbarity, or cruel oppression of body or conscience, and that God allows poor mankind no remedy in any such case, but that they must patiently subject themselves to be trode down, butchered, and destroyed by one of their fellow-creatures at his pleasure! For this were to make almighty God, who is the merciful parent of mankind, the patron of cruel oppression and tyranny, which he abhors and declares against in the strongest terms.

Lastly, Let Jacobites remember, that our sovereign king George II. hath undeniably an hereditary right to our crown in the Protestant line, his house being the only Protestant family in the world of the royal line of Stuart. And seeing, by our fundamental laws and settlement, every man that is a papist is declared incapable to inherit the crown of these realms, it being found by the grand council and wisdom of these nations, after the freest and maturest deliberation, that a king of Popish principles is incompatible with their safety and welfare; all Popish heirs whatsoever are to be held as naturally dead, and so they are in the sense of the law. Wherefore, in consequence of this fundamental law, the illustrious house of Hanover hath plainly in course, as well as by the free choice of these nations, all the hereditary right and title to the throne that any legal prince can have. And, according to the said settlement, king George I. succeeded peaceably to the crown, and was universally submitted to by these nations upon his coming to us.

Well then, if it be lawful for nations of their own free choice to seoure their religion, their liberties, laws, and properties from utter ruin and subversion, by excluding Papists from the throne; and if it be lawful for them to confer their government where they think these choice and valuable blessings will be best secured; there cannot be a better title to a crown in the world than our present king hath. Why? It is the deliberate gift of a whole nation, unasked, unsought for by him, or any of his ancestors. For, the crown was most freely and voluntarily offered to, and settled upon, princess Sophia of Hanover, and her heirs, continuing Protestants, about fifteen years before that settlement took place; and, during that interval, the title of that illustrious house was frequently confirmed by many acts and oaths. Princess Sophia was declared successor, as next of kin in the Protestant line, being grand-daughter to king James VI., and that in pursuance of former acts and laws designed to be fundamental and unalterable, which excluded all papists from succeeding. Now, our present gracious sovereign being grandson of the said princess Sophia, her title is naturally and legally conveyed to him. It was plainly upon the principles of necessity and self-preservation that these Protestant kingdoms proceeded to exclude Papists from the succession to their crown, and to secure to themselves, as much as may be, a king of their own religion, and whose principles are consistent with their safety and happiness; and what reasonable man can blame them for so doing?

From what is said, it evidently appears how groundless and unreasonable the present rebellion is; and doth yet more appear, when it is considered, that no man hath the least hardship or oppression to complain of from the present king or his administration, and none could say that he had ever made any infringement upon the laws or liberties of the subject: nay, the rebels themselves, while peaceable, had the same free access to all encouragements and privileges with the king's best subjects. And, seeing they had not the least shadow of provocation for it, it must be horribly wicked and impious in them to rise up to spoil and murder those who desire to live quietly in the land under a Protestant government to which they are sworn, and can have no freedom to consent to a change, suffer what they will for it.

Again, I desire all to consider, should the rebels succeed in their design, how dreadful the consequences must be; our Protestant king must be deposed and murdered, and so must all his family, if they do not flee. And the consequence of this must be, that no Protestant prince must ever rule these nations again, but a succession of Popish princes must be established for ever. And again, the consequence of that must be, the rooting out of the Protestant religion in these kingdoms for ever, and settling Popery for ever in its stead, together with French tyranny and arbitrary power. And what would probably follow on this, but the extirpating of the Protestant religion in all our settlements and colonies abroad, yea, in all places of the earth? For I look upon Britain as the main fence, under God, of the Protestant religion through the world, and its strongest bulwark against Rome and her allies.

I do not mention these things merely to amuse or frighten people without cause; for these consequences seem to be most natural and unavoidable, and must follow natively, if free agents be permitted to act freely, and natural causes to produce their natural effects. So that they must certainly happen, if God, by a wonderful power, do not interpose to hinder them; and I know not what ground we have still to expect miracles. Again, let us take a view of the mischiefs, the robbery and plunder, the murders and massacres, which the rebels must needs be guilty of before they can possibly reach their end, seeing they have the king and parliament and whole wealth of the three nations against them. We may reasonably suppose them to come that length, as to burn or pillage many towns, villages, and single houses; nay, to rob, abuse, wound, and murder many thousands of innocent people. Why? Merely because they adhere to the established government, and do not assist them in their rebellion. Possibly, when they entered upon it at first, they might have no intention of such cruelties; but, if they persevere in their present course, their necessities and circumstances will unavoidably bring them to them at length. They may promise the restoring of our peace and privileges upon the event of their success; but what ground can we have to expect the security of our properties from men of arbitrary principles, liberty to tender consciences from Papists, or men of a persecuting spirit, protection to our trade from the tools of those who are the rivals of our trade, or safety to the Protestant religion from a Romish bigot educated at Rome by the Pope, to whom he is so dear, that he has appointed prayers, and the sacrament to be exposed, for his success in Scotland?

But though we have no ground to trust the promises of Papists and their abettors, yet let us still trust in a gracious God for deliverance from their power: for seeing God, by his wonderful hand, hath brought about a reformation from Popery and idolatry, and settled the true Christian religion in Britain, Ireland, and other nations, we have reason to hope that God will not give us up to our enemies, however sharp a scourge he make them to us, in regard the preservation of true religion through the world seems very much to depend upon the safety of Britain. We have ground to believe it is not the scheme of providence to suffer the Protestant religion wholly to sink; especially considering how wonderfully God hath interposed for it against the designs of Rome in many instances, and hath promised to destroy Babylon at length. It would fill a volume to give a history of the miraculous revolutions, preservations, deliverances, and interpositions of divine providence in behalf of the Protestant religion in Britain, within these 200 years past, particularly in the years 1547, 1558, 1560, 1588, 1605, 1688, 1690, 1692, 1696, 1708, 1714—1716, 1743, 1745. The seasonable interpositions for Britain and for the Protestant religion in these years, show how much they are the peculiar and constant care of providence. Now, what so reasonable account can be given for such a numerous set of deliverances, but that God has thought fit to make this island a fence and bulwark against Rome and her wicked attempts to subvert true religion and Christianity? For she has employed her worldly ecclesiastical power these 1200 years to spread idolatry, delusion, corruption, impiety, war, and destruction among the nations. Blessed be God, that hath so eminently honoured Britain in times past to stop her career, and doth still preserve this island for that end, notwithstanding of our heinous sins and provocations. He even saves us for his name's sake. And his interpositions for us against the designs and attempts of Rome have frequently been by ways and means very surprising and unexpected by us, "not by our sword or our bow, but by his own right hand, arm, and countenance." How remarkably hath he appeared for us sometimes, by striking terror into the hearts of our enemies, even in the time of their greatest fierceness and boasting, and made them haste to flee away! He hath made the name of a single person a terror to them, as he did the name of Gideon to the Midianites, Judges vii. 20, when the whole host fled at their hearing him and his three hundred men blow their trumpets, and cry, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon." Now he who hath so delivered us formerly, is still the almighty and faithful God; and therefore we trust in him that he will yet deliver us, 2 Cor. i. 10.

At the same time I acknowledge, that the present awful dispensations of God to the land are very humbling, and have a loud voice to men of all degrees and stations among us, calling us to consider our ways, repent of our sins, abandon the prevailing vices of the age, and set about a thorough reformation. But seeing this subject is so excellently well managed in a late pamphlet, intituled, Britain's Remembrancer, or the Danger not over, London printed, and reprinted at Edinburgh, and sold there by Messrs Lumisden and Robertson, I shall add no more upon it, save earnestly to recommend the said pamphlet to everybody's serious perusal and consideration: the author hath indeed remarkably served his generation by it.

What I have said in this preface of the British constitution and revolution-settlement, brings to my mind some positions about government, that are supported not only by the light of nature and strongest reason, but also by the judgment of the most eminent lawyers and civilians; which I humbly recommend to the consideration of those who plead for the indefeasible hereditary right of princes, and for unlimited monarchy and arbitrary power.

1. God Almighty hath left nations the liberty of setting up such models of government as best please themselves.

2. Magistrates were ordained for the good of nations, and not nations for the honour and glory of magistrates.

3. The right and power of magistrates, in every country, is that which the laws of the country make it to be.

4. These laws are to be religiously observed; and the oaths which are taken, having the force of a contract between magistrates and people, cannot be violated without danger of dissolving the whole fabric.

5. As none can say they receive their kingdoms immediately from God, the best right that any can challenge to their crowns is, that they and their ancestors received them by the consent of willing nations.

6. If this be not acknowledged, there is no king in the world that has any title to that crown he wears, nor can plead it, unless he could deduce his pedigree from the eldest son of Noah, and show that the succession had still continued in the eldest of the eldest line, and had been so brought down to him.

There is one thing more that I would say to the reader of the following sermons; that as I had not room, so I thought it not needful to burden them with long quotations from the Council of Trent, the Council of Constance, Lateran Council, Bellarmine's writings, the Rhemists, and others, which most evidently verify the Protestants' charge against Popery; yet I think I have been so cautious in my assertions, that Papists will not readily accuse me of misrepresenting Popery. But, if any should do it, let the reader peruse what many Protestant authors have quoted from their councils and writings; such as Tillotson, Stillingfleet, Wake, Tension, Owen, Poole, Baxter, &c. And particularly consult Doolittle's Sermon on the Novelty of Popery; Clarkson's Practical Divinity of the Papists; a Roman Catechism, licensed by authority, and printed at London, anno 1686. And every one of these will show I have not given a wrong account of the Romish religion.

SERMON I.

"BUT THOUGH WE, OR AN ANGEL FROM HEAVEN, PREACH ANY OTHER GOSPEL UNTO YOU, THAN THAT WHICH WE HAVE PREACHED UNTO YOU, LET HIM BE ACCURSED, OR BE UNDER AN ANATHEMA," GAL. I. 8.

THE apostle here is reprovng the Galatians for unstedfastness in the faith, and being so apt to be seduced by error, and into that which he calls another gospel, as it had led them to another way of justification and salvation than Jesus Christ had laid down in his gospel, and was preached and written to them by his apostles. But, to fortify them against false teachers, the apostle, with great assurance, asserts the truth and reality of the gospel he and other ministers of Christ had preached unto them. And he is so fully persuaded of the divinity of the gospel-way of salvation by faith in Christ Jesus, that he pronounces an anathema upon these who would preach any other gospel: and to show them that this sentence did not proceed from passion or intemperate zeal, but from divine inspiration, he repeats it in the next verse, "Let them be accursed." Also observe how strong he puts the case in the text, "Though we, or an angel," &c., as if he had said, "Were it even possible that an apostle working miracles, or a bright shining angel from heaven, should forge or preach a new gospel to you, his gospel is to be judged an imposture, and himself accursed, for corrupting and falsifying the pure religion of Jesus Christ."

DOCT.—THOSE WHO TEACH ANOTHER GOSPEL OR RELIGION THAN CHRIST HATH TAUGHT AND LEFT TO THE WORLD, ARE EXPOSED TO THE DREADFUL CURSE OF GOD.

Here I propose to do these three things: I. Inquire what is meant by this curse. II. Who they are that teach another gospel, and are exposed to it. III. To apply this doctrine to some who are particularly guilty.

I. By the curse denounced in the text, is meant the just sentence of God's sin-revenging justice, which burns most fiercely against sin, and not not only denounceth but inflicts terrible wrath and vengeance, in the judgments which he pours out upon those who rebel against his holy revealed will, and particularly those who contemn his gospel-way of salvation laid down in his word.

II. Who are these that teach another gospel? Ans. They are such as pervert the good tidings which Christ publisheth, or alter the method of salvation revealed by him in his gospel or written word, by opening a different way of justification and salvation to fallen mankind, than what is there laid down. Such were the false teachers among the Galatians, here reprov'd, who taught justification not to be by faith, but by the works of the law: this the apostle calls another gospel, which exposes its teachers to God's heavy curse. Why? Because hereby they would pervert the very design of Christ's gospel, and make it serve quite contrary purposes to what he intended by it. Christ's design was to advance God's glory in man's salvation, and to humble the lost creature before him; to make self nothing, and free grace all. Now, these Galatian teachers, who would have justification to be by works, forged a gospel of their own, which served to exalt self, and to disparage the free grace of God in saving sinners through Christ; which is directly contrary to the design of the true gospel of Christ. Again, there was another thing these teachers inculcated upon Christians, as necessary; that they should submit to the old yoke of ceremonies, though now abrogated by Christ's coming: this being against the gospel of Christ, the apostle warns them against it, as another gospel; "Stand fast," saith he, "in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made you free, and be not entangled again in the yoke of bondage," Gal. v. 1.

But I hasten to the third head I proposed, being the main thing I intend.

III.—The application of the doctrine.—My text and doctrine speak both reproof and terror to the church of Rome, as much as to the false teachers in Galatia, in regard they teach another gospel in the two respects above mentioned, as well as they, and so are equally exposed to the apostle's anathema. Why? The Romanists teach another way of justification than by faith in Jesus Christ, to wit, by their own works and merits. Likewise, they lay upon Christians a yoke of uninstituted ceremonies and superstitious inventions, upon which they lay great stress for acceptance with God; whereby they forge a new gospel for exalting self, and disparaging free grace, contrary to the design of the gospel of Christ. Now, whoever they be that do this, be they apostles, be they angels, be they Popes, or pretenders to infallibility, the Spirit of God denounces an anathema against them. Let papists then dread the efficacy of this curse, who, in their new gospel, forbid what Christ requires, and requires what he forbids; of which afterwards. Were their eyes but opened, it might greatly affect them to see the church of Rome and her Council of Trent, who are so very liberal of anathemas and curses upon others, I say, to see themselves here anathematized with a vengeance, by one whose authority they must confess, is superior to theirs. Surely this one anathema of the Spirit of God is more dreadful than all the bruta fulmina of Rome and her infallible bishops.

Now, that it may more convincingly appear that Popery is here anathematized, I intend to demonstrate at some length from the holy scriptures, the only rule of faith and practice in religious matters, that Popery is another gospel, another scheme of salvation than what Christ lays down in his gospel: yea, that Popery is not Christianity, but antichristianity; a religion devised by antichrist, exceeding dangerous and damnable to the souls of men. And this subject I judge proper to insist on at this time, that I may exonerate myself, and give warning to all my hearers, and to all my fellow-protestants in Britain and Ireland, could my word reach them, of the evils and dangers of Popery, when these nations are threatened with it, more than they have been at any time since the revolution in 1688. That Popery then is another gospel, appears by the following arguments.

First Arg. That religion which teacheth many doctrines as matters of faith, and duties as matters of practice, for which there is no foundation or warrant in the word of God, nay, many of them expressly contrary to it, is evidently another gospel than that of the Lord Jesus Christ, which draws on the dreadful anathema in the text: but Popery is such a religion; therefore it is another gospel, &c.

The whole counsel of God relating to things necessary for God's glory and man's salvation, is contained in the bible; as is evident both from the text, and from Isa. viii. 19, 20; 2 Tim. iii. 15, 16; 2 Pet. i. 19.

But the church of Rome teach many doctrines and practices which have no scripture foundation, as many learned Popish divines are forced to acknowledge, such as, "The sacrifice of the mass, half-communion, seven sacraments, worshipping of saints and images, purgatory, prayers for the dead, indulgences and dispensations from the Pope, penance, auricular confession, public service and prayers in an unknown tongue; that it is necessary to salvation that all be subject to the bishop of Rome, and that they believe that church to be the mother and mistress of all churches." For all these and other doctrines, they have no authority from scripture, Christ never taught them.

Nay, many of their doctrines are expressly contrary to what Christ hath taught. They teach the making, worshipping, and bowing down to graven images, contrary to Exod. xx. 4, 5. Worshipping angels, saints, relics, the cross, bread, &c. contrary to Exod. xx. 3; Mat. iv. 10; Col. ii. 18. Human merits, and works of supererogation, contrary to Luke xvii. 10; Rom. vi. 23; Tit. iii. 5. Other mediators and intercessors between God and man, besides Christ the one mediator; contrary to 1 Tim. ii. 5; Rom. viii. 34. The doctrine of transubstantiation, contrary to 1 Cor. xi. 26—28; Acts iii. 21; Mat. xxvi. 29; John xvii. 11. The sacrifice of the mass, contrary to Christ's one sacrifice, and his once offering it; asserted, Heb. vii. 27; ix. 28; x. 12, 14. Their taking the cup from the people, contrary to Mat. xxvi. 27; 1 Cor. xi. 28. Their purgatory, and men's satisfying for their own sins, contrary to 1 John i. 17; Rev. xiv. 13. Their public service and prayers in an unknown tongue, contrary to 1 Cor. xiv. 16, 26. Their prohibiting meats and priests' marriage, contrary to 1 Tim. iv. 1, 2, &c.; Heb. xiii. 4. Their exempting the clergy from the jurisdiction of the magistrate, contrary to Rom. xiii. 1. Their adding to the scriptures, contrary to Prov. xxx. 6; Rev. xxii. 18. Their forbidding people to read them, contrary to John v. 39; Col. iii. 16; Rev. i. 3. Their teaching that men may be perfect without sin, contrary to 1 John i. 8; Eccl. vii. 20. From all which we see that Popery is both unscriptural and antisciptural, and consequently another gospel than Christ's, and under the anathema of the text.

Second Arg. That religion which prescribes other terms and conditions of salvation than Christ hath appointed, or a great many devices of men as necessary means of grace, for obtaining pardon and acceptance with God, without warrant from Jesus Christ, is another gospel than his, and under the anathema in the text: but Popery is such a religion; therefore Popery is another gospel, &c.

The Spirit of God teacheth us that Jesus Christ only is the way to the Father, that he is the king and head of his church, that he hath the keys and all power in his hand, that he opens and shuts heaven at his pleasure, prescribes the terms which none may add unto, out of blind zeal, or pretence of good intention, see John xiv. 6; Mat. xxviii. 18; Rev. iii. 7; Deut. xii. 32; Mat. xv. 9; Isa. xxix. 13; 1 Pet. i. 18; Heb. xiii. 21; 1 Sam. xv. 22, 23.

But the church of Rome requires terms of remission of sin never prescribed by Christ; such as particular confession, that is, those who would obtain pardon of their sins, must confess them all in the priest's ear, even every evil thought or design, a political contrivance of Rome. So that though a man truly repent, confess his sins to God, and forsake them; yet he cannot be forgiven, unless he confess them to the priest. This Christ never required. Again, they allow salvation to none but those who are subject to the Pope and the church of Rome. All this is another gospel than that of Jesus Christ; for he teacheth that all those who truly repent and believe in him shall be saved, without any regard to Rome or her Pope. Likewise, they make many superstitious devices of their own needful to pardon of sin, and acceptance with God; such as holy water, holy oil, crosses, beads, bells, roses, agnus dei's images, crucifixes, processions, pilgrimages, visiting the shrines and sepulchres of saints, kissing and adoring their relics, burning incense to them, wax candles, hallowed swords, bells, spells of the gospel, &c. Also, they place much religion in vestments, tonsures, gestures, crossings, bowings, kneelings, and governing the motions of the body. Now, the soul being intent upon these outward visible things of men's devising, cannot but be much diverted from the spiritual worship of an invisible God, which Christ in his gospel closely presses, John iv. 24. Likewise, the bringing a yoke of uninstituted ceremonies and human inventions upon the necks of Christians, is inconsistent with the gospel liberty which Christ hath purchased for them, and the apostle exhorts them to maintain, Gal. v. 1. All which evince Popery to be another gospel than Christ's.

Third Arg. That religion which puts corrupt glosses and meanings upon these qualifications and duties which Christ requires in order to salvation, such as faith, repentance, regeneration, prayer, attending ordinances, partaking of sacraments, holiness of heart and life, whereby the way to heaven is made broader than Christ makes it, is another gospel which draws on the anathema in the text; but Popery is such a religion; therefore, &c.

Jesus Christ in his gospel teaches us the necessity of the new birth, worshipping God in spirit, keeping of the heart, mortifying sin, denying self, universal holiness, &c., upon which account he saith, "Strait is the gate, and narrow is the way that leads to life, and few there be that find it," see John iii. 3; iv. 24; Prov. iv. 23; Mat. xxiii. 26; v. 29; vii. 14; xvi. 24; 2 Cor vii. 1.

But the church of Rome speaks otherwise: the faith which they require is no better than the faith of devils, a bare assent to revealed truths; for so they define justifying faith. The repentance they require doth not necessarily include contrition or godly sorrow for sin; it is enough if there be attrition, that is, such a sorrow for sin as only proceeds from the fear of hell, though it be not mixed with love to God, or a sense of ingratitude to him, and of despising his mercy in Christ. Attrition with confession to the priest, joined with the sacrament of penance, and sacerdotal absolution, they reckon sufficient for obtaining pardon of sin and eternal life. Which is a great encouragement to men to spend their days in sin, and expect salvation after all: for, according to Popish doctrine, if a man after the most wicked life, when death approacheth, be but sorry for his sins, only because he is afraid of being damned for them, confess them to the priest, and get his absolution, all is safe. This is not Christ's gospel: for he makes repentance to include a change of the heart and mind, as well as the outward life; and he looks to the sincerity of the heart in all our professions and performances. Christ saith in his gospel, There be few that find life; but the Pope saith in his, There be few that miss it, except those who die suddenly; for the most profligate wretch on earth, if he can have but a few minutes with a priest before his death, his business is done, he dies the death of the righteous, though he has lived the life of a profane atheist. The papists may refuse, as they will, that their Pope is antichrist; but the bible tells us this doctrine is antichristianity.

The church of Rome, instead of pressing a change of heart and inward holiness upon men, they make them easy, by telling them that the Opus operatum, or outward work wrought, is enough; that is, the mere outside of religion, the external performance of duties, and partaking of sacraments, is sufficient to save them. If they get the outward part of baptism, confirmation, the wafer-bread, and sacrament of penance, all is well, though sincerity and inward devotion be wanting. This is another gospel subversive of the whole scheme of Christianity; for Christ teacheth us, that God must be worshipped in spirit, he must have the heart in duty, and bodily exercise profiteth little; that outward actions, without inward affections, are so far from being acceptable to God, that they are hateful to him. The Spirit of God tells us, he is highly offended with those who draw nigh to him with their mouths, when their hearts are far from him. But say the church of Rome, Fear not, if you move your lips, speak the words, say so many prayers, so many ave marias, pater noster, drop so many beads, &c. Though you want close attention or inward devotion, that is but a venial sin: whatever defects be about the Opus operatum, the ministration and absolution of the priest will supply them all. This is evidently another gospel, and most destructive to the souls of men. But I shall insist more largely upon this Popish corruption in the next argument.

Fourth Arg. That religion which corrupts men's morals, and encourages them in the way of sin and vice, or tends to overturn the practical part of Christianity, as well as its doctrine, is another gospel than that of our holy Jesus, which draws on the anathema of the text: but Popery is such a religion; therefore it is another gospel, &c.

Christ's religion is a holy religion: for in his word or gospel he teaches us to mortify sin, and crucify the flesh with the affections and lusts thereof; and to study the practice of true holiness without which no man can see the Lord; and to have our fruit unto holiness, that we may attain the end, everlasting life; see Rom. viii. 13; vi. 22; Gal. v. 25; 2 Cor. vii. 1; Heb. xii. 14. The gospel or doctrine of grace teaches us to deny all ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world; to have a respect to all God's commandments; to keep them all, without turning aside to the right or left hand: it forbids to be conformed to the bad practices of this world, or to touch the unclean thing; see Tit. ii. 11, 12; Psal. cxix. 6; Deut. v. 32; 1 John ii. 3, 4; Rom. xii. 2; 2 Cor. vi. 17. Although true believers be not under the law as a covenant of works, to be thereby justified or condemned, yet Christ having adopted the law into the covenant of grace as a rule of life to them, they are bound to walk according to it in all respects, and to hate every sin, and abstain from it. Christ will not allow nor dispense with any one known sin in his people, Psal. cxix. 4—6, 101, 104, 128; Jam. ii. 10, 11; Rom. xii. 9; 1 Pet. iii. 11.

But the church of Rome many ways indulge sin; encourage men to neglect piety, to break God's law, and thereby corrupt the lives and morals of men. I shall give some few instances, for evincing the truth of this charge.

1. Their teaching the sufficiency of attrition to penitents, and of the Opus operatum in religious performances, as I observed in the preceding argument, hath a manifest tendency to ruin practical godliness, and banish inward devotion and vital piety from amongst men.

2. They make the exercise of many of the Christian graces and duties unnecessary, by turning God's commands into counsels; such as these, to mortify sin, crucify the world, deny ourselves, take up the cross, &c. These and such like, they say, are only matters of counsel, not of command; and consequently the neglect of them is no sin: which doctrine must be a great stop to the practice of godliness, where it is believed.

3. Though the scriptures plainly teach that every sin in its own nature is mortal, Rom. vi. 23; Gal. iii. 10; yet Papists teach that there are some sins, which they call venial, that do not deserve hell, and need no pardon nor Saviour. And among these venial sins, they reckon many scandalous enormities; such as lying, fornication, cursing, swearing, and even blaspheming the name of God, providing it be not done deliberately, or be not perfectly voluntary. Of such sins Bellarmine saith, "Though all the venial sins in the world were gathered into one, they can never make up one mortal," and so cannot possibly damn a man; wherefore they judge men's consciences need not to be troubled about such sins. Which doctrine greatly encourages vice.

4. If a man judge bible-rules or prohibitions too strict for him, they hold that the Pope can dispense with them, as he hath often done for money, so as to allow fornication, incest, incestuous marriages, and even sodomy, of which there are many instances. The Pope hath dispensed with oaths and vows to God, with leagues and pactions among men; with the duties between husbands and wives, parents and children, &c. He gives dispensations to Papists to promise any thing to Protestants for deceiving them, if in their hearts they stand well affected to Popery: and he dispenses with their breaking all such promises and pactions, if it serve his interest.

5. They encourage sin greatly by their doctrine of indulgences. The Council of Trent affirm, that the Pope can remit the punishment of sin both here and in purgatory. This power of indulgence or pardon they found upon works of supererogation, that is, the overplus of the satisfactions and merits of Christ and the saints: of this treasure the Pope keeps the key; and such portions as he pleases to dispense to particular persons, are called indulgences; and these are obtained by pilgrimages, reciting certain prayers, assisting the Pope, or by money. And these indulgences are committed to certain monks and priests to sell and dispose of for money. It was this execrable practice that first awakened Luther to oppose Popery: he judged it a device of Satan, to make sin cheap, and to encourage men in wickedness. And surely, when men can have a plenary indulgence or pardon for so trivial a satisfaction, as standing before the doors of St. Peter's church at Rome, when the Pope blesses the people at Easter, it makes sin as easy to be committed as pardoned. And what they speak of saints' merits, and works of supererogation, is without any scripture-foundation. Also, it is most blasphemous to join the merits of men with the merits and satisfaction of Christ; and to say, that a man on earth can dispose of any part of Christ's merits as he pleases, and that for money; or that he can extend the power of the keys, which Christ gave to his church on earth, to souls in another world, and there to remit punishments inflicted by divine justice! Horrible blasphemy!

6. They encourage wickedness, by teaching that a good end sanctifies the means, however foul these be. And so all sorts of villany are consecrated by a zeal for their church. Nay, perjury, lying, treason, poisoning, stabbing, rebellion, and all kinds of bloodshed and murder, in that case, are with them not only lawful, but even heroic virtues, and meritorious of salvation. They reckon it a good work, and meritorious, to prosecute, kill, and murder those who differ in religion from them, whom they call heretics; as they think that they serve God and his church by so doing. And they teach, that those who are most active in this bloody work, merit a high degree of glory in heaven. And, with such doctrine as this, the priests have spirited up the Papists in sundry nations to massacre and destroy Protestants in great numbers: so that the Babylonish whore had been long drunken with the blood of the saints, and the blood of the martyrs of Jesus; according to what John foresaw, Rev. xvii. 6.

7. They teach the lawfulness of equivocation and mental reservation in swearing oaths, making promises and contracts, in order to deceive those they deal with; and they make use of words with double meanings for that end. They make it lawful to break the most solemn oaths and contracts, when it is anywise for the interest of their church. And, whatever security a Popish prince gives to his Protestant subjects for enjoying their religion or liberties, they teach that they are nowise bound thereby. Nay, their religion requires them to break all oaths and engagements to Protestants; according to the decree of the fourth Lateran council under Pope Innocent III., the decree of Pope Martin V., and that in the nineteenth session of the Council of Constance, and the acts of a late Pope Clement XI. tome 2, page 179. All of them agreeing in this, that no faith is to be kept with heretics, when any thing is stipulated prejudicial to the church of Rome.

These few instances are only a swatch of the corrupt practical divinity of the Papists, and may serve to fill us with detestation of such an antichristian, perfidious, and bloody religion as Popery, as being quite another gospel than that of our holy, spotless, and undefiled Redeemer.

Object. "If Popery hath corrupted Christianity so much both in doctrine and morals, how is it that there are so many moral and devout people among Papists? And how is it that sundry of their divines have written such pious books, recommending and pressing morality and godliness?"

Ans. 1. If some men of the Romish religion be piously disposed, they are not led to it by their principles, which are of a most dangerous nature and tendency, destructive to true Christianity, as I have represented them.

2. Many in the communion of the church of Rome have abhorred the corruptions of that church, and have exposed them too, though they had not courage enough to withdraw from it, as they ought to have done.

3. If some of that corrupt church have written or lived like Christians, notwithstanding of their antichristian doctrine, there is ground to fear that far greater multitudes have been eternally ruined by it. When men come once to believe, that they may gratify their lusts all their days, and be saved at last by auricular confession, penance and priests' absolution; very few will refuse to gratify them. If the observing of the Opus operatum, or the outward part of sacraments and religious performances, will procure pardon to the most flagitious livers; many will make mere charms and spells of sacraments, and go to them with hearts full of adultery, and hands reeking with blood. May all of us then seek grace from God to "cleave to that which is good, and to abhor that which is evil!" And may we still abhor that religion which would dishonour God, discredit his word, and encourage impiety and wickedness among men! May we also keep up our zeal against every thing that tends to introduce such an antichristian religion into these lands, and pray fervently to be preserved from it!

SERMON II.

"BUT THOUGH WE, OR AN ANGEL FROM HEAVEN, PREACH ANY OTHER GOSPEL TO YOU, THAN THAT WHICH WE HAVE PREACHED UNTO YOU, LET HIM BE ACCURSED," GAL. 1. 8.

In the preceding sermon, I have adduced four arguments to prove Popery to be another gospel than that of our Lord Jesus Christ. I proceed to add to them, in the next place,

A Fifth Arg. That religion which takes people off from the holy scriptures, and casts contempt upon them, is another gospel than Christ's, and under the anathema of the text: but Popery is such a religion; therefore, &c.

Before I mention the Popish errors relative to the scriptures, it is fit we hear what the Spirit saith of the holy scriptures. He teacheth us, that they are given by inspiration of God, to be the rule of faith and life; and that the observing this rule is the only way to please God here, and to attain salvation hereafter: and therefore he enjoins us to read and study the scriptures, to regulate our faith and practice by them, and to instruct our children in them; see 2 Tim. iii. 16; Eph. ii. 20; Isa. viii. 20; Luke xvi. 29, 31; Rev. xxii. 18, 19; John v. 39; Col. iv. 16; Deut. vi. 7; xi. 18, 19. He also commends those who read and study the scriptures, and pronounces them blessed, Josh. i. 8; Acts xvii. 11; 2 Tim. iii. 15; Rev. i. 3. He shows us, that they were not written only for ministers, but also for the people; and they are directed to them, for their use, in the vulgar tongue, which they best understood; see John xx. 31; Eph. iii.

4; 1 John i. 4; Rev. i. 11; ii. 24; yea, to persons of every rank and degree, as kings, subjects, fathers, young men, children, husbands, wives, masters, servants, &c.; see Deut. xvii. 18, 19; Josh. i. 8; Rom. xiii. 1, &c.; 1 John ii. 13; v. 13; 1 Pet. ii. 13, &c.; Eph. v. 22, &c.; vi. 1, &c.

Yet notwithstanding of what the Spirit of God saith of the holy scriptures, his own dictates, and their usefulness to all sorts of men, and the necessity of their reading and searching them for their souls' salvation; the church of Rome slight, condemn, and discredit the scriptures many ways; which being so contrary to the Spirit of Christ, must certainly come from the spirit of antichrist.

1. In order to weaken the authority of the scriptures, which they find so opposite to them, they would fain accuse them of imperfection, obscurity, corruption, &c.

2. They maintain many doctrines not contained in the scriptures, yea, directly contrary to them; as I showed in the foregoing sermon.

3. They teach that the scriptures are not sufficient to salvation, unless the traditions of the church be joined with them; and these traditions, though inconsistent with the scriptures, they appoint to be received with equal veneration with them. Now, we see, Christ in his word rejects all such traditions, in Mat. xv. 9, "In vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men;" that is, commandments that require what God doth not require, and forbid what God doth not forbid. Christ will have all his followers to receive his written word, as the great store-house of his truths, containing all things necessary to be believed for salvation.

4. They impose new scriptures on the world, by making books canonical, which the ancient church still held as apocryphal, and that upon good ground; for the words of some of the authors testify that they were not inspired by the Spirit of God; see 2 Mac. xv. 38; where the author makes apology for the weakness and imperfection of his work, which is not like the language of the Holy Ghost.

5. They hide the scriptures from the people, and forbid their reading them in their own language. And though they may indulge some of their people in this matter where the reformation takes place, yet they deal more strictly elsewhere. They say, people by reading the scriptures may drink in error, and so get more hurt than benefit; wherefore none should read them without licence from the bishop or inquisitor. Strange doctrine! Must we have a licence from men to obey our Lord Jesus, who commands us to read them? Must we lay aside the scriptures because some abuse them? They may as well say we should lay aside our meat and drink, because some destroy their life and health by them! Thus the Papists make themselves guilty of the crime of the Jewish lawyers, for which our Lord denounces a woe against them, to wit, they took away the key of knowledge from the people, Luke xi. 52.

6. They exalt the church of Rome and her bishop above the scriptures, by making them the infallible judge, to determine the sense of the scriptures, and all controversies about religion: yea, they will have the authority of the scriptures founded upon the church; whereas the church and her authority is founded upon the scriptures. The authority of the scriptures doth not hang upon any church, or the voice of any man, but upon the voice of the Spirit of God that speaketh in them, who hath wisely ordered his own word to be the best expounder of itself, by speaking more clearly in one place what is more darkly delivered in another.

Sixth Arg. That religion that gives a particular church or bishop the sovereign dominion over the faith of Christians, or such a headship, supremacy, or infallibility, as should oblige all men to give them implicit faith or blind obedience, is another gospel: but Popery is such a religion; therefore, &c.

Protestants maintain, according to God's word, That God alone is Lord of the conscience, which he hath left free from the doctrines and commandments of men, that are anywise contrary to his word, or beside it, in matters of faith or worship: that Christ discharged his apostles to assume any such dominion over the faith or consciences of men, which accordingly they disclaimed, and owned their subjection to the scriptures, and allowed their hearers to examine their doctrine if it was agreeable to them. Wherefore no church or bishop now can teach such doctrines, or give such commandments in matters of faith or worship, as are disagreeable to God's word; neither ought any to believe or obey them, but to maintain that Christian liberty which Christ hath obtained for them; see Jam. iv. 12; Acts iv. 19; v. 29; Mat. xxiii. 8, &c.; Luke xxi. 25, &c.; 2 Cor. i. 24; Acts xvii. 11; Col. ii. 20; Gal. v. 1. Protestants also maintain, That the purest churches and the best men on earth are liable to errors and mistakes, seeing they know but in part, and therefore cannot be our rule; yea, some famous churches have degenerated so far, as to become no churches of Christ, but synagogues of Satan, Mat. xxiii. 9; Gal. ii. 11, &c.; 1 Cor. xiii. 12; Rev. xviii. 2; Rom. xi. 20, &c. And none hath any claim to be head of the church but the Lord Jesus Christ; and the Pope of Rome can in no sense be head thereof, but is that antichrist, that man of sin and son of perdition, that exalteth himself in the church against Christ and all that is called God, and openeth his mouth in blasphemy against God; see Col. i. 18; Eph. i. 22; Mat. xxiii. 8, &c.; 2 Thes. ii. 3, 4, 8, 9; Rev. xiii. 6. We see then, that the word of God quite overthrows the pretended supremacy and infallibility of the church and bishop of Rome.

But the church of Rome maintains, that she is the mother and mistress of all churches; and that it is necessary to salvation for all persons to believe her to be so, and to receive her doctrines upon her sole authority, and to be subject to her bishop, who is head of the church, and hath supreme power on earth over the whole church; that she with her bishop have never erred, nor can err; that they are the infallible interpreters of scripture, and judge of controversies. And all this they assert without any ground from scripture, nay, in plain opposition to it.

If any church on earth hath a claim to be the mother of all churches, it is Jerusalem, not Rome; for there the church began, as was foretold, Isa. ii. 3, "Out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." If Rome will be mistress because she was once the imperial city, then Constantinople hath an equal title; for she was so also, and got a decree of the council of Chalcedon in her favour, Can. 28. And pray, doth Rome's being once the imperial city, give her any title to be the judge of the sense of scripture, and of all controversies, and to be infallible too in her judgment, and in all her doctrines and practices? They must show a better title before Protestants own it. They must show where infallibility is promised to the church of Rome, more than to the churches of Scotland, England, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Antioch, Corinth, Ephesus, the Greek church, &c. Why may not any of these churches lay claim to the same right of judgment and infallibility with Rome, seeing Rome can plead no promise nor revelation for it more than they? But yet we see, in spite of all reason and good sense, they do and will maintain the church of Rome is infallible. And indeed, it is by this unreasonable and wilful assertion that they fortify themselves in the grossest errors and absurdities, against the most demonstrative arguments of Protestants brought against them. How can any convince the church of Rome or her adherents of mistakes, so long as they believe her infallibility? How can we bring her to remorse for her errors, while she confidently maintains she cannot err? The whole articles of the Romish religion hang upon this one point, their church and Pope's infallibility. Should they let go this one article, Rome presently falls headlong, and her delusions are shamefully exposed to all men.

But have they nothing to say for this marvellous article? Why, say they, Rome is the seat of the papal or infallible chair, and this keeps the church from erring: for they make the church and Pope all one. However much they speak of the church, all is included in the closet of the Pope's breast; and upon his judgment all things so depend, that whatever he determines must be received without contradiction, as if every officer and member of the church had voted in it: so that the Pope is the same with the church. Now it is this absurd principle of the church or Pope's infallibility, which is the great foundation and pillar of the Romish faith, that is, the long train of errors gradually received by them for above a thousand years' time. No warrant have they from reason or antiquity, more than from scripture, for the infallibility of the bishops of Rome more than of other bishops. The best Popish historians confess, that they were far from excelling others in holiness, wisdom, or learning; nay, they own that many of them were notoriously wicked, even atheists, blasphemers, heretics, adulterers, conjurers, necromancers, &c. and some of them so illiterate as scarcely to know the rules of grammar. Now, is it easy to persuade Protestants that men so wicked, so ignorant, were fit to be infallible interpreters of the scriptures, or to be supreme dictators to the universal church? Though this be unanswerable, yet Rome is still so tenacious of her supremacy and infallibility, that it seems to be an invincible bar in the way of any reformation; for they are so puffed up with the conceit of it, that let Protestants argue never so strongly, they will not acknowledge the least error, nor quit the greatest absurdity, nor make any step to meet or gain them: Protestants must either go into all their errors, and swallow this infallibility with the rest, otherwise there can be no reconciliation.

Now the great ground of their claim is, The bishops of Rome are the apostle Peter's successors; though they cannot make it appear that Peter was bishop of Rome, or that he ever was there. The apostles were not fixed pastors of any city, having the whole world for their charge. And though Peter had lived at Rome, this could not entitle the bishops there to Peter's apostolical dignity and power, which died with himself. As all the apostles, by their commission, were equal in power and dignity, so Peter never arrogated any power or supremacy over the rest. He knew his Master had expressly discharged this, Luke xxi. 25, 26; Mat. xx. 26, 27. Hence we find him humbly submitting to his brethren, when called to account for his conduct, Acts xi. 2, &c. and obeying their order, when they sent him forth in mission to preach the gospel, Acts viii. 14. And it is evident from Paul's conduct, that he owned no supremacy in Peter above the rest; for he withstood him to the face, when he judged him blameable, Gal. ii. 11. And he saith of himself, that he was in nothing inferior to him or any of the apostles, 2 Cor. xii. 11. None of the apostles then had any primacy above the rest. If any had a claim to it, one would think that John bid fairer for it than Peter, in regard he was the beloved disciple that leaned on our Lord's breast, and long survived Peter and all the other apostles, and so most fit to be universal pastor. When Peter died, will Papists say, that either Linus, Cletus, or Clemens, the succeeding pastors at Rome, assumed the supremacy over John or other surviving apostles?

The supremacy and infallibility of the bishops of Rome is a mere usurpation, without any foundation from scripture or antiquity. The primitive fathers, and the whole church, never dreamed of it for six hundred years after Christ; nor did ever any bishop of Rome claim it, until it was conferred upon Boniface III. by the emperor Phocas, who murdered his master, Mauritius the emperor, and his whole family, and usurped the empire; he exalted Boniface to the dignity of Pope, or universal bishop, for favouring his usurpation. And this is the best title the Pope hath to his supremacy and infallibility, which indeed is none at all. God has appointed no supreme or infallible judge on earth, for all Christians to resort to, beside the holy scriptures. Had he appointed any other, he had told us in his word where to find him; but he is so far from that, that on the contrary he requires every man to judge for himself according to scripture-rules, 1 John iv. 1; 1 Thes. v. 21; Gal. i. 8. It was in obedience to these commands, that Protestants at the reformation searched the scriptures, and judged for themselves, and thereupon separated from the antisciptural and idolatrous church of Rome, as they found God required them to do, 2 Cor. vi. 17, 18; Rev. xviii. 4.

Seventh Arg. That religion which errs in the fundamental doctrine of justification, (being articulus stantis aut cadentis ecclesiæ) and overturns the doctrine of free grace in justifying and saving sinners by the obedience and sufferings of Christ in their room, and would ascribe the glory of man's salvation to man himself, is another gospel, which falls under the anathema of the text; but Popery is such a religion; and therefore, &c.

Protestants hold, according to the scriptures, that God freely justifies sinners, or pardons and accepts their persons as righteous, not for any thing wrought in them, or done by them, but for Christ's sake alone, and his obedience and sufferings imputed to them, and rested on by their faith, which faith also is freely given; so that their justification is only of free grace: and there is no place left for glorying or boasting in the creature, or in a man's own works or doings; all our glorying and rejoicing should be in the Lord Jesus only, and in God's free love through him; see Rom. iii. 24, 25, 27, 28; Tit. iii. 5, 7; Eph. i. 7; ii. 9; 1 Cor. i. 31, 32; Phil. iii. 3; Jer. xxiii. 6.

But this scripture-way of free grace in justifying sinners doth not please the Papists; they will needs have man to have something to glorify of in himself, expressly contrary to the will and mind of the Spirit of God: and therefore they will add their own merits and satisfactions to Christ's merits; their own sufferings by penance in purgatory, to Christ's sufferings; their own daily sacrifice of the mass, to Christ's one sacrifice on the cross; the mediation of saints and angels, to Christ's mediation and intercession. And though they speak of Christ's merits, yet they lay the main stress on the man himself; for they deny the imputation of Christ's righteousness to us for our justification, and assert that a man is justified by his own inherent righteousness, and that his own good works merit eternal life, and that in a proper sense, not only de congruo sed de condigno; that is, not only by virtue of God's covenant and acceptance, but also by reason of the work itself, and its intrinsic worth.

Quest. "Seeing Papists speak much of the merits of Christ in obtaining our salvation, how make they Christ's merits and their own consist together?"

Ans. Moderate Papists take this away: they say, Christ by his merits procured God's promise to give life and salvation to our merits; in short, that Christ merited a new covenant of works to us, and also new grace and strength to us for to keep it, providing that by our free will we duly improve it. And thus every man is to stand or fall, in obtaining the promised life, according to his fulfilling the condition of works in the use of the grace given him. So it is not Christ's Surety righteousness that is imputed to us for our justification and salvation; no, it is the man's own inherent righteousness, and his right use of his own free will in improving the grace given him, that merits salvation to himself: and so a man's hope of salvation is properly founded upon his own merits and doings. By this scheme, Christ is spoiled of his glory, and men bring guilt and wrath upon themselves.

Object. "But," say Papists, "we acknowledge Christ's merits in obtaining a new covenant and new promises to us, and in procuring the first grace to us, in order to our justification and salvation."

Ans. This is nothing but a sly way, under pretext of paying a compliment to Christ, to deprive him of the glory of our salvation, and to ascribe it to man: for it is by the right use of his free will, and his performing a righteousness of his own, that he is to merit and purchase life for himself; so that a man may still boast of his own doings. "But," say some Papists, "it is God that gives us," upon Christ's account, "the inherent grace and righteousness whereby we are justified." They may as well say, that God gives us wherewith we may redeem ourselves; for we are both redeemed and justified by the same price, namely, Christ's Surety-righteousness and blood. As our inherent righteousness cannot redeem us, so neither can it justify or acquit us before God. It is only Christ's perfect righteousness and satisfaction, imputed to us, that can do this. By grace we are justified, and saved through faith, not of ourselves, but of and by him alone who is the Lord our righteousness. It is in him only that all the seed of Israel shall be justified, and in him that they shall glory, Isa. xlv. 25. So that, by the revealed gospel-scheme of salvation, Jesus Christ is immediately made our righteousness by imputation, in the merit whereof only, we can have confidence to appear before God, and expect pardon and salvation from him; according to 1 Cor. i. 30, "He is made to us of God, wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption." 2 Cor. v. 21, "He hath made him to be sin for us, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him." Col. iii. 11, "Christ is all and in all."

We see then how dangerously Papists err in this cardinal point of justification, which of all others is most important to our salvation; and how carefully we should avoid all Popish doctrine in the matter of justification, though even some called Protestants should teach it. Popery quite perverts the gospel of Christ, and overturns the covenant of grace, the only way now to be saved, and lays down a way of salvation upon the same terms as it stood in the covenant of works, though this way of access be for ever blocked up by the fall. Yet, say Papists, obedience to the commands, and the merit of good works, is the only way to life still; and for this they cite Mat. xix. 17, "If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments." But it is plain, that Christ there intends to convince and humble a self-righteous Pharisee, by holding him to the covenant of works to which he leaned, in order to bring him to an affecting view of his impotency to keep it, of his miserable and hopeless case while under it, and of his absolute need of a surety to fulfil the demands of that covenant in his stead. Thus God makes the law a schoolmaster to lead sinners to Christ.

Popery then is evidently another gospel; and a damnable one it is: for it draws away sinners from the true remedy for sin, to a false one; from the only ground of their justification, the imputed righteousness of Christ, to their own inherent righteousness, which is naught. It takes them from the lowly self-denying way of salvation of Christ's teaching, to the proud self-exalting way of antichrist's devising. Christ will have the creature humbled, but antichrist will have him puffed up. Now, whether shall Christ's word or his enemy's stand? "Let God be true, but every man a liar." O how damnably do Romanists err in the way of justifying and saving sinners! They are guilty of dreadful blasphemy and abominable idolatry, and have no solid way for removing such heinous guilt; nothing but their own merits, filthy rags! Alas! when the disease is deadly, and the remedy naught, what can be looked for but death to follow? God saith, It is only by a covenant of grace and a Mediator's righteousness we must be saved. No, say Papists, it is by a covenant of works and our own righteousness. Now, if they live and die in such a belief and dependence, they make their salvation impossible. Why? They are "fallen from grace, and Christ shall profit them nothing," Gal. v. 4. Which awful consideration should make every thinking Christian tremble at the remotest approach of Popery.

My friends, let me then exhort you to have your hearts sound, and your minds well instructed in this great article of a sinner's justification, seeing it is of the utmost importance to your salvation; it is highly provoking to God, and dangerous to your souls to err in this matter. O has God in his wonderful love given the world his dear Son, as their only surety, to save them when perishing; and will men slight such a glorious gift, and pretend to save themselves? How is it possible they can do it, after God hath declared there is no salvation in any other, and none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved, but that of the blessed Jesus? Will any that names the name of Christ be so foolish as to betake himself to another way of salvation than what he hath proclaimed to us in his gospel? Let me beseech you, as ye love your souls, to believe the Lord Jesus, and go not back with Papists to a covenant of works for salvation; for your salvation that way is impossible, your damnation inevitable. You have need to guard with great caution and care against such a dangerous and damnable mistake, and the rather that your hearts are all naturally inclined to it. There is ingrained in every man something of a natural Popery; we would all fain stand upon our own legs, and have something of our own to found our hopes of heaven upon. This was the first way of salvation when we were in Adam's loins, and hence all his posterity have a natural hankering after it, and are with great difficulty brought off from going about to establish their own righteousness, and persuaded to submit to the righteousness of God, Rom. x. 3.

But, however backward men's hearts are to it, God will have all the seed of Israel brought to this humble submissive way, and made willing to quit all dependence upon any righteousness of their own, and betake themselves entirely to an imputed righteousness for justification and acceptance with God. This is the way that God hath fixed for saving fallen sinners of Adam's race; and all the elect of God will go into it, yea, rejoice in it, as a noble contrivance for advancing the glory of the Creator, and securing the happiness of the creature. And seeing God declares himself well pleased with the righteousness and satisfaction of Christ for sinners, it is highly our wisdom to declare ourselves well pleased with it too, and so put honour upon his dear Son; for God will never accept of those who dishonour him, by seeking to join their merits with his, or their polluted duties with his most perfect obedience, as if they would add perfection to Christ's sacrifice and blood, which is infinite. What is it else but blasphemy, to charge his sacrifice with lameness, or his satisfaction with deficiency, and to think to make it up by adding something of ours? yet this all do practically, who would mix their own righteousness with Christ's in the point of justification: but this will never do; Christ will either be our whole Saviour, or no Saviour. Blessed be God for Jesus Christ. Amen.

SERMON III.

"BUT THOUGH WE, OR AN ANGEL FROM HEAVEN, PREACH ANY OTHER GOSPEL UNTO YOU, THAN THAT WHICH WE HAVE PREACHED UNTO YOU, LET HIM BE ACCURSED, OR BE UNDER AN ANATHEMA," GAL. I. 8.

BESIDES what I have said to prove Popery another gospel, let me add, in the next place,

An Eighth Arg. That religion which teacheth men to make graven images, to worship and bow down before them, or directs men to worship any other but the one only living and true God, is another gospel than Christ's, and falls under the anathema of the text: but Popery is such a religion; therefore, &c.

The holy scriptures teach us, that religious worship is only due to God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and to him alone; but not to any creature whatsoever, Exod. xx. 3; Mat. iv. 10; John v. 23; 2 Cor. xiii. 24; Rom. i. 25. They teach us, that God is not to be worshipped by images, or under any visible representation; nor in the mediation of any other, but of Christ alone, the one Mediator, Exod. xx. 4; Deut. iv. 15; Rom. i. 23; John xvi. 6; 1 Tim. ii. 5; Col. iii. 17.

But the church of Rome, in direct opposition to God's command, pay religious worship to images, angels, saints' relics, the cross, Pope, and bread. I shall say a few things of each of them.

I.—Of Image-worship.—They make images for religious worship, bow down and kneel before them, pray, confess, burn incense to them, &c. And they are so sensible that all this is against the second command, that they leave it out in their catechisms and books of devotion, alleging that the second is only a part or pendicle of the first command; and therefore they call the third command the second, and the fourth the third and so on. And because the people had always heard there were ten commands, they, to blind them, would keep up the number, by splitting the tenth into two: and so with them the ninth commandment is, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house;" and the tenth is, "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife," &c. A poor blind indeed! Our Lord, not only in the second command, but in several other texts, forbids all idolatry and image-worship, and tells us, that God is a Spirit, so he must be worshipped in a spiritual manner, and not by images. The primitive church, for six hundred years after Christ, abhorred image-worship and all appearance of idolatry; and there was nothing of it in the church, until the man of sin brought it in near the end of the seventh century: soon after that, images of all kinds were introduced, as of the blessed Trinity, of angels, the virgin Mary, apostles, martyrs, saints, &c., all which images men were enjoined by the church of Rome to worship and bow down to. They blasphemously pictured the glorious Trinity: the Father as a reverend old man; the Son as a man on a cross, or as a lamb; and the Holy Ghost as a dove: and these do Papists fall down before, contrary to God's express prohibitions; see Deut. iv. 15, 16. "Take ye good heed unto yourselves, for ye saw no manner of similitude in the day the Lord spake unto you in Horeb: Lest ye corrupt yourselves, and make you a graven image, the similitude of any figure, the likeness of any beast," &c. Since God chose no similitude to appear in, to the people of Israel, they must not presume to make one for him. Why? The making of such images or similitudes is highly disparaging and injurious to an infinitely glorious God: "For this," saith the Spirit of God, "is to change the glory of the uncorruptible God into an image, like unto corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts," &c., Rom. i. 23. It is very remarkable how closely the Papists have imitated the Pagans in this matter, and yet are not ashamed.

“But,” say Papists, “the Pagans made images of false gods, and worshipped them.”

Ans. The making and worshipping images of the true God is forbidden, as well as those of false gods. The Israelites did not design the worship of a false god, when they made the golden calf, Exod. xxxii. 5. Nor did Micah and his mother design it in the graven image they made; Judg. xvii. 3, 17; nor did the ten tribes in worshipping the calves of Dan and Bethel: yet God was highly provoked against the worshippers of those images.

Romanists would excuse themselves, by saying, “They do not worship the images; they only worship God, and pray to him before them.”

Ans. The idolatrous Jews had the same excuse for their worshipping before the golden calf, Exod. xxxii. 5, “To-morrow is a feast,” said they, “to Jehovah.” But God discharges us to bow down before an image; see 2 Chron. xxv. 14.

II.—Of Angel-worship.—As Papists worship the Trinity by images, so they worship angels and saints before images which they make for them, and all this contrary to God’s repeated commands and threatenings. Yea, God so much abhorreth idolatry, that he is jealous of every thing that hath a tendency to it; therefore he forbiddeth us so much as to set up an image, Deut. xvi. 22, “Neither shalt thou set thee up any image, which the Lord thy God hateth.” Yet Papists, in spite of all these prohibitions, set up many images, and commit idolatry with them too, in defiance of the authority of the great and dreadful God. But to skreen themselves a little from the charge of idolatry, they would make a distinction between Latria and Dulia, two Greek words used in scripture for worship. Latria, they say, is the worship they give to God; and Dulia is the worship they give to angels and saints. But it is well known that the vulgar make no distinction between the worship they give to one or other of them, and the learned of them are at a loss to show wherein the difference lies: nay, we see the scriptures make none, for they use the two words promiscuously for the worship due to God, and condemn the giving either Latria or Dulia to creatures. Look to the original language in Gal. iv. 8; Rom. i. 25.

As for angels, the Papists teach and direct men to worship them, and pray to them, as they undertake the care of our salvation: and as every man, say they, hath a guardian angel, so it is fit that he commit himself more particularly to him. But though we are to honour angels, as they are God’s ministers sent forth to minister to them that shall be heirs of salvation: yet we dare not worship them, seeing our Lord expressly forbids us to worship any but God, Mat. iv. 10, and condemns angel-worship, Col. ii. 18. We see also, angels, when worship hath been offered to them, reject it with abhorrence, because derogatory to God the only object of worship; which is recorded for our direction, Rev. xix. 10, “See thou do it not; worship God.” Yet, in defiance of all these prohibitions, Papists will have men to worship both angels and saints.

III.—Of Saint-worship.—They worship saints departed, pray to them, offer incense, make confessions and vows to them; and so fond are they of this worship, that they make many more applications to saints than to God, and have many ave Marias for one pater noster. They even put the Virgin Mary and other saints in Christ’s room, by praying to God to hear them for the merits and intercession of the saints. Also they say mass for the honour and memory of saints, as of the blessed Virgin, the apostles, &c. And the Council of Trent pronounce an anathema against them who blame them for it. What an impious perverting of the Lord’s supper is it, to celebrate that in remembrance of saints, which our Lord instituted in remembrance of himself! Yea, they conclude the service with praying that this their sacrifice of the mass may be accepted and made effectual for the merits and intercession of saints. O horrid blasphemy! to plead that the sacrifice of Christ’s body and blood, as they make it, may be accepted and made effectual for the merits of saints! But all this blasphemy is the more easily swallowed by the people, that the service is performed in a language they do not understand.

But to what a blasphemous height do they carry their worship to the Virgin Mary! They call her, in their public litanies and prayers, the mother of grace and mercy; the queen, the gate of heaven; the refuge and advocate of sinners, &c. And in their prayers to her, they have these words, That by thy intercession and merits, all our works may be directed according to Thine and thy Son’s will; where they put her will before our Saviour’s will:—yea, they use these blasphemous words, By thy authority as a mother, command thy Son; which cannot but fill Christian ears with horror.

Ans. 1. Even this is unlawful, seeing we have no command, example, or warrant for such addresses in the bible: but, on the contrary, we are told that God only is the object of worship, and are commanded to call upon God in the day of trouble, not upon saints; when we want wisdom, to ask it of God, and to put our trust in God, and pour out our hearts before him, not before departed saints; see Psal. l. 15; lxii. 8; Jam. i. 5. It is but a voluntary humility, Col. ii. 18, not required nor accepted of God, to pretend unworthiness to come into his presence, and, as it were, from a sense of this, to go about to employ creatures to be our mediators with God, when God requires us to come immediately to himself. Should a king think fit to command his subjects to come straight to himself with their petitions, and not to any of his courtiers; graciously assuring them that he was delighted with them, always at leisure to hear them, and a thousand times more compassionate than any about him: what would be thought of a man that would despise the king's command and gracious assurance, and would spend his time in addressing this and the other servant to introduce him to the king? Every one would judge him guilty of great folly, as well as contempt for authority.

2. To choose creatures for our mediators is sinful, because God hath appointed his eternal Son for that office, who is every way fit for it, and infinitely preferable to all others; being one with God: and it must be highly disparaging to this great Mediator, to pass by him, and employ others not authorised for that office. It is in vain for Papists to make a distinction between a mediator of redemption and intercession; for the scripture makes none, but asserts that he is the one Mediator between God and man, who gave himself to be a ransom for us, 1 Tim. ii. 5, 6, and that he only is our intercessor with God, who died and rose again, and sits at the right hand of God, Rom. viii. 34. So that there is no other mediator that hath right to our addresses, but Jesus Christ alone.

"But," say they, "what more idolatry or sin is there in addressing saints departed, than for one to employ his friend in this life to pray for him?"

Ans. 1. It appears from Popish missals and books of devotion, that they not only address saints to pray for them, but that they also pray directly to them, to bestow blessings on them both spiritual and temporal.

2. We have both scripture-precepts and examples for addressing living saints to pray for us, but none of these have we for addressing the dead.

3. We know the living hear our requests, but have no ground to think the dead do so, but that they do not, from Isa. lxiii. 16, "Abraham is ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledgeth us not." Nay, we are assured that it is God's incommunicable prerogative to know the heart, and to know and hear secret prayer, 2 Chron. vi. 30; Mat. vi. 6, and it must be sinful in any to give his glory to another.

4. We do not address the living in such a manner as the Papists do the dead. They kneel, and invoke an absent invisible being, a being in another world, in an adoring posture and disposition, and with the same abstraction of thought as they worship God, and pray to him: which is nothing like our desiring living saints to pray for us.

5. What else is it but a deifying of creatures for men to worship them, as if they could search their hearts, know their own secret desires, hear the petitions of thousands or millions at one time, who may be thousands of miles distant from one another! Should all the world address one saint at once, as possibly the Popish world may do the Virgin Mary, it would require omniscience or ubiquity in that creature to know and hear all their requests. Which plainly shows us that Papists by their practice make gods of men, and so are guilty of idolatry.

IV. Of Relic-worship.—The church of Rome not only worship saints and their images, but they also worship their relics, that is, the remainders of their bodies, or such things as belonged to them when alive, as an arm, leg, bones, ashes, the chains or instruments by which they suffered. They pretend, that, by the religious veneration of such relics, many benefits are received, miracles wrought, diseases cured, devils cast out, &c. Although many vile cheats and impostors have been discovered, touching the pretended virtues of Popish relics, yet they still maintain this idolatrous practice. Nothing have they in the bible for it, but much against it. Because God knew the Israelites' proneness to idolatry, he buried the body of Moses in a place none knew of, Deut. xxxiv. 6, to prevent their worshipping his relics. And when the devil would have showed the grave and body of Moses to the Israelites, for ensnaring them, Michael hindered it; which seems to be the contention spoken of, Jude ver. 9. When the Israelites abused the brazen serpent to idolatry, as being a relic of Moses, and a memorial of the miraculous cures God wrought upon their ancestors by it; good king Hezekiah brake it in pieces, calling it Nehushtan, a piece of brass, 2 Kings xviii. 4. From which we see, that, though it were true what Papists say of miracles wrought by these relics, it would not be a good reason for the reverence and worship they give them; nay, that idolatrous worship is rather a good reason, according to Hezekiah's practice, for giving them a decent interment than for enshrining them.

"But," say Papists, "we read in scripture, that a dead man was raised to life by touching Elisha's bones; and from Paul's body were brought handkerchiefs and aprons for curing the sick," &c.

Ans. Though God thought fit to work miracles by Elisha's bones and Paul's handkerchiefs, that is no argument for worshipping them; but the worshipping them is a better argument for breaking them all to pieces. The primitive Christians worshipped no such relics.

V.—Of Cross-worship.—They also worship the material cross, or the figure of that on which Christ was crucified; they ascribe peculiar virtues to it, and pray that God would make the wood of the cross “the stability of faith, an increase of good works, the redemption of souls:” nay, they pray directly to it, to “increase grace in the godly, and blot out the sins of the guilty.” Likewise, they give to the cross Latria the same worship they give to God: and since they own it is idolatry to give Latria to any but God, and yet give Latria to the material cross, they must, in this instance, be self-condemned as idolaters. But there is no end of the idolatry, superstition, and will-worship of the Romish church: some of their own writers have been so sensible of it, that they have acknowledged with regret, that Popish Rome is nothing inferior to Pagan Rome in this matter. Good reason then have all true Christians to avoid communion with her, and keep separate from her; as we are plainly called and warned by God to do; 2 Cor. vi. 16, 17; Rev. xviii. 4.

VI.—Of Pope-worship.—They likewise deify and adore their Pope. They exalt him into Christ’s room, and give him divine titles and honours: they call him their Lord and God, Dominus Deus noster papa, Deus alter in terra, idem est dominus Deus et papæ, universal head of the church, &c. They give him power to make laws to bind the conscience, and say that Christians are bound to give him implicit faith and blind obedience. They are not to examine his laws and prescriptions by the scriptures, as the Bereans did the apostles’ doctrine; but all must implicitly obey his commands, though never so contrary to the commands of God; as when he commands the worshipping of images, prohibits the people to read the scriptures, or to take the sacramental cup, refuses marriage to priests, exempts them from the jurisdiction of magistrates, &c. They give the Pope power to dispense with God’s laws at pleasure, to forgive sins committed against God, and to remit the punishment he might inflict for them, to open and shut both heaven and hell; and therefore he wears a bundle of keys at his girdle. Hence the Spirit of God calls him “the man of sin, who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God;” and saith, “he is full of the names of blasphemy, and opens his mouth in blasphemy against God;” see 2 Thes. ii. 3, 4; Rev. xvii. 3; xiii. 6.

Just grounds have we to separate from the church of Rome as a grossly idolatrous and blasphemous church, rejected and abandoned of God. Far worse is she than the ancient enemies of Christ, the Scribes and Pharisees; for they still held that principle, that none can forgive sin but God only. But the Romanists have given up that principle, and give this power to their Pope. O what daring usurpation must it be for a subject, and one that is a criminal himself, to presume to pardon crimes committed against his almighty sovereign, and to remit the punishment which belongs to him to inflict! How admirable is the patience and long-suffering of the King of heaven and earth, that can bear so long with such insolence and blasphemous indignities from a worm of the earth!

VII.—Of Bread-worship.—The church of Rome worship the bread in the sacrament, which they call the Hostia; though they have no precept nor example in scripture for this adoration, nor was there any such practice in the church for eight hundred years after Christ. It never began until the monstrous doctrine of transubstantiation was brought in, which taught that Christ is corporally present in the bread; a doctrine against both scripture and reason. How absurd is it to teach, that a poor silly priest hath power when he pleases to make a God, by muttering a few words; and, as soon as he makes it, the people must fall down and worship it; and, when that is done, they must presently eat and devour their god! And yet so violent are Papists for this idolatry, that they would burn and destroy those who will not bow to their bready god. But though transubstantiation were possible, yet Romanists, according to their own principles, are in continual hazard of idolatry, namely, by giving divine worship to a creature; for they can never be sure that the bread is changed into Christ’s body, seeing they grant the change may be hindered by sundry defects; such as, if the bread be not wheat bread, if it be corrupted, if the wine be soured, if there be more water than wine, if the priest err in the words of consecration, of which the people cannot be sure, seeing he utters them with such a low voice that he cannot be heard; or again, if the priest’s intention be not right in consecration; or if he be no priest, through some error in his ordination or baptism, or in the ordination or baptism of his authors, even back to the apostles’ times. For in any of these cases, by their own doctrine which suspends the validity of all sacraments upon the intention of the priest, and other such things, the consecration of the bread is invalid, and no real change is made; and then the worshippers of it must be guilty of idolatry. Now, what an unsafe and unhappy religion must Popery be, that exposes the people so frequently to the danger of idolatry! a sin which God declares to be so abominable and hateful in his sight! Jer. xlv. 4. And hence it is, that the Spirit of God, when he speaks of the idols of the nations, calls them by the name of abominations; as the abomination of the Moabites the abomination of the Ammonites, the abomination of the Zidonians, &c. And indeed we have just ground to speak in the same style of the abomination of the Papists; for their idolatry is as abominable, as that of the Jews or Pagans of old.

We may hence see, that it was with good reason, and upon just grounds, that our ancestors about two hundred years ago separated from the church of Rome and her worship. Why? God abhors idolatry, and calls all his people to separate from idolaters, and come out from among them, because the temple of God can have no agreement with idols, 2 Cor. vi. 16, 17. And, in particular, God gives the loudest warnings and plainest calls to separate from Babylon, or idolatrous Rome, Rev. xviii. 4, 5, "Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues; for her sins are reached unto heaven. Now, what are the sins which bring on her plagues? They are the heaven-daring and God-affronting sins of blasphemy and idolatry mentioned before. And we see how particularly God points forth the gross idolatry of Babylon, and her ensnaring the nations into it with her, as the main sin which provokes the Lord at length to destroy her, Rev. xiv. 8, "Babylon is fallen, because she made all nations drink of the wine of her fornication." Idolatry is called wine, because it is sweet and palatable to corrupt nature, and soon intoxicates men. And frequently, in scripture, idolatry is called fornication, namely, in a spiritual sense, as it is going a-whoring from God, Hos. ix. 1. And it is often called adultery, upon the same account, Jer. iii. 8, 9; Ezek. xxiii. 37; Jam. iv. 4. The Lord is a jealous God, and will not suffer his spouse to go a-whoring after other gods, but will have her as a chaste virgin presented to him, and preserved for him; otherwise the marriage-relation cannot subsist, Hosea iii. 3, "Thou shalt abide for me, thou shalt not play the harlot, so will I also be for thee." Idolatry breaks the marriage-covenant between Christ and his church, as adultery doth it amongst men; and for this sin he sends desolating judgments. It was idolatry that brought desolation upon Israel, and made their land spue them out. And to this day the Jews are so sensible of the God-provoking nature of this sin, that, when any great judgment or calamity befalls them, they say, There is an ounce of the golden calf, they made in the wilderness, given them in it. Likewise, it is for idolatry that Rome will in one hour be made desolate; see Rev. xviii. 3, 19.

As idolatry is a land-desolating and church-destroying sin here, so it is a wrath-kindling and soul-damning sin hereafter. We see God expressly declares all idolaters to be in a damnable state, 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10, "No idolater shall inherit the kingdom of God." Rev. xxi. 8, "Idolaters and all liars shall have their part in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death." Surely then Romish idolaters have great cause to fear and tremble, because of their gross idolatry, as well as for their blasphemy, and the damnable errors in the grand article of our justification before God, which I handled in the preceding sermon. O that God might open their eyes to read and consider what the word of God saith concerning them in the text above cited, and particularly in Rev. xiv. 9—11, "They who worship the beast, and receive his mark in their forehead and hand," that is, those who thoroughly and openly adhere to the antichristian profession, "they shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, and shall be tormented with fire and brimstone, where the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever!" O what a sad religion must Popery be, that hath the everlasting wrath of God threatened against it, and those who profess it! Likewise, it is said, Rev. xvii. 8, "They who wonder after the beast, their names are not written in the book of life." We have also a very awful confirmation of these threatenings against Papists, which would make them reflect with terror upon their errors and delusions, in 2 Thes. ii. 11, 12, where it is expressly asserted, that they who believe the delusions of the man of sin, are given up to be damned. Now, these being the words of the Spirit of God, we cannot alter them, nor take from them. But by them we are called to think seriously of the damnable nature of Popery, and to bless God for our deliverance from it; and also to commiserate their ease who are carried away with Romish delusions, and pray earnestly for them, that God may open their eyes, as he was pleased in mercy to do to this land at the Reformation; and that he may still preserve us from the return of Romish idolatry and delusions, and from every thing that would open the door unto them. For since God gives it as the strong reason for his people's coming out and separating from the idolatrous church of Rome, because he was to destroy her for her idolatry, and because all who drink of the wine of her fornication, shall also drink of the wine of God's indignation, Rev. xiv. 10, it is highly our wisdom and interest to shun and avoid, with the greatest care, the idolatry and delusions of Rome, and all the snares and methods of those who are concerned to promote her interest, and in their rebellion would appoint a captain to lead back these lands into Egyptian bondage, as in Neh. ix. 17. Still remember the caution of the apostle John, 1 John v. 21, "Little children, keep yourselves from idols;" as if he had said, Shun all idolatrous communion, avoid fellowship with idol-worshippers, their society is infectious and dangerous: since ye have the knowledge of the true God, pay all your religious worship and honour to him, as the sole object of worship and adoration; let no creature partake with him in it. Adore not your God by statues and images, which would share with him in his worship; he forbids all these. Remember your God is an incomprehensible Spirit, and would reckon himself disgraced by such sordid representations. Hence it is, that he often puts that question to idolaters, Isa. xl. 18, "To whom then will ye liken God? or what likeness will ye compare unto him?" Intimating that he looks on it as an intolerable affront to liken the glorious invisible God to a poor despicable creature. May God preserve us from the abominable sin of idolatry! Amen.

SERMON IV.

"BUT THOUGH WE, OR AN ANGEL FROM HEAVEN, PREACH ANY OTHER GOSPEL UNTO YOU, THAN THAT WHICH WE HAVE PREACHED UNTO YOU, LET HIM BE ACCURSED, OR BE UNDER AN ANATHEMA," GAL. i. 8.

I STILL proceed in my argument to prove the Romish religion another gospel than that of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Ninth Arg. That religion which makes nature vainly proud, in allowing a man to glory in human works and merits, in puffing him up with a vain conceit of perfection here, and of his ability to do more than God hath required, and even to merit salvation for others, as well as for himself; that religion is another gospel than Christ's, and falls under the anathema of the text: but Popery is such a religion; therefore, &c.

The Christian religion, or gospel of Christ, is a self-denying and creature-humbling way of saving sinners; allowing no place for human merit, or for our glorying in anything, but in our Lord Jesus only, and the free mercy of God in him. Besides what I said before on this head, Arg. 7. concerning justification, I shall here adduce some of the arguments brought by the Spirit of God against the Popish doctrine of merit either for ourselves or for others.

1. The Holy Spirit asserts, that God cannot be made a debtor to man, as the Popish doctrine would make him; for, saith he, to him that worketh or meriteth, the reward is not reckoned of grace, but of debt, Rom. iv. 4. But it is absurd to think it can be of debt, for a man cannot be profitable to God, Job xxii. 2. This our Lord confirms, Luke xvii. 10, "When ye shall have done all these things which are commanded you, say, We are unprofitable servants; we have done that which was our duty to do." Now, how can any man merit by doing what was his bounden duty to do? Papists would do well to consider three things about the best human works. 1. We do only what we were bound to do. 2. What good we do we receive grace from God to do it. 3. The reward which God bestows, infinitely exceeds the worth of our doings. Which three things cut off all pretence of merit in us.

2. The Spirit of God teacheth us, that no man in this life can attain to absolute perfection in keeping God's law, or perfect freedom from sin; and that the best of men fall short of their duty in many things, being only renewed in part, and having the remains of corruption in them, which fight against the spiritual and renewed part: and all this the best saints acknowledge, and mournfully complain of their imperfections; see Eccl. vii. 20; 1 John i. 8; Jam. ii. 3; Rom. iii. 23; vii. 18, &c.; Gal. v. 17; Job ix. 2, 3. And hence it is, that our best performances are imperfect and defiled with sin, and all our righteousness as filthy rags, Isa. lxiv. 6. And how can such works as these merit eternal life? nay, seeing the divine law requires a perfect righteousness, and denounces a curse against every breach or defect, surely our polluted performances can merit nothing from God but a curse. No man but Jesus Christ, our infinitely perfect Surety, could perform the perfect meritorious righteousness which the law required from us.

3. The Spirit of God intimates to us, that, seeing the covenant of works was broken by our first parents, none of their posterity can have salvation by it; and that God hath revealed another way to justify and save sinners, to wit, freely, by grace, through the redemption of Christ, and by faith in him: and therefore eternal life is now the free gift of God to men through Jesus Christ, who satisfied the law for us; so that no flesh, in this fallen state, can look for justification by the deeds of the law, or his own doings; see, for all this, Psal. cxxx. 3; cxliii. 2; Eph. ii. 5, 8; Rom. iii. 20, 24; vi. 23; Gal. ii. 16.

4. The Spirit of God, in order to cut off all dependence on our own works or merits, teacheth us, that justification is only to be had by faith, in opposition to justification by works; in regard faith is the mean or instrument whereby we lay hold upon our Surety's righteousness, and get it imputed to us for our justification before God: and, upon this account, it is called the righteousness of God by faith; and Christ, who performed it, is called the Lord our righteousness, and is said to be made of God unto us righteousness; see Rom. v. 1; Gal. ii. 16; Phil. iii. 9; Jer. xxiii. 6; 1 Cor. i. 30.

5. The Spirit of God teacheth us, that the great scope and design of the gospel-way, contrived by God for saving sinners since the fall, is to exalt and glorify the free grace of God through Jesus Christ, and to humble man before God, and exclude all boasting in himself. But the Popish doctrine of merit impiously derogates from God's free grace, and Christ's perfect righteousness and merit; and so would rob God of his glory in the salvation of sinners, and give ground to men to glory in themselves; which is evidently another gospel, and a way that is both contradictory to God's word, and destructive to men's souls; see Rom. iii. 24, 27, 28; Eph. i. 6; ii. 8, 9; 1 Cor. i. 29; Tit. iii. 5.

The Papists maintain, that men by their good works, and satisfactory deeds, may not only attain to perfection in this life, and merit heaven for themselves; but they may supererogate, that is, they may do more than what is required of them, and so have superfluous merits and satisfactions to spare to such as need them. But the scripture-arguments before adduced against human merits, quite overturn all the Popish works of supererogation; for, if a man cannot merit for himself, he can far less merit for others. The best saints in scripture acknowledge the defects and short-comings of their best duties, and, after all they have done, that they are unprofitable servants, and have nothing to plead before God but the greatness of his mercies, and that their sufferings here are not worthy to be compared to the glory that is to be revealed; see Luke xvii. 10; Jam. iii. 2; Neh. xiii. 22; Rom. viii. 18. Now, if our doings or sufferings here be not worthy to be compared to the glory of heaven, how can any man have worth, merit, or satisfactions to transfer to others? Instead of trusting to such imaginary helps from others, the Spirit of God requires every man to prove his own work, and then he shall have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another; for every man shall bear his own burden. And he tells us, that every one of us shall give an account of himself to God; Gal. vi. 4, 5; Rom. xiv. 12. So that, at the great day, no man can answer for nor benefit another by his merits: for the wisest virgins will have no oil to spare, to supply others, at that time, Mat. xxv. 9. But pray, what is the need of men's having recourse to the merits of creatures to help them, when there is an infinite sufficiency in the merits and sufferings of Christ to supply and save all that come to him? Surely this must be nothing but a device of Satan or antichrist, to throw disgrace and contempt upon Christ's satisfaction and sacrifice.

Tenth Arg. That religion which adds five new sacraments to the two of Christ's institution, and so corrupt and disguise these two that it is hard to know our Lord's institution in them, is another gospel than Christ's, and falls under the anathema in the text: but Popery is such a religion; therefore, &c.

The Lord Jesus Christ, the only King and Head of his church, who hath authority to institute sacraments in it, to be visible signs and seals of the covenant of grace, hath only ordained two sacraments in the gospel, baptism and the Lord's supper. And the Spirit of God forbids men to add to them, saying, "Add thou not unto his words, lest he reprove thee, and thou be found a liar;" see Mat. xxviii. 19; 1 Cor. xi. 23; Rom. iv. 11; Prov. xxx. 6. Yet notwithstanding of our Lord's sole legislative power in his church, and his fore-said authoritative prohibition, the Papists have added five sacraments to Christ's two, namely, confirmation, extreme unction, matrimony, holy orders, and penance: but none of these five did our Lord appoint for sacraments, neither hath any of them the constituent parts, the matter and the form, the elements, or words of consecration, which are necessary to make a sacrament. As our Lord instituted only two sacraments, and recorded the same in his word; so the church in the primitive ages received only these two. The Popish number of sacraments was not known in the Christian church for eleven hundred years after Christ, nor was it made a matter of faith until about 1500, by the council of Trent.

2. The Papists make the uprightness of the priest's intention in consecrating sacraments, to be necessary unto their validity; so that, if this intention be wanting, the sacraments are null. Upon this account, they can have no certainty whether the administrators be either Christians or priests, because they know not certainly the intention of those who baptized and ordained them; nor do the people know if they themselves be baptized, nor whether in the eucharist that which they worship for Christ's body, be any other than bread.

And for the sacrament of baptism, the Papists have so disguised it with their corrupt additions, that it hath quite another face. Why? They have brought in anointing with oil; signing many times with the cross; the using of salt; spittle; the priest's blowing on the child's face; exorcism, which is composed of certain conjuring words, actions, and signs, for driving out the devil; and a great many childish fantastical ceremonies, not appointed by Christ, but wholly devised and authorised by antichrist. Again, they hold, that men, women, or infidels, may baptize in case of necessity, though Christ appointed his ministers only to do it, in Mat. xxviii. 19, 20, where we see the power of teaching and baptizing go together. Also, they maintain, that those who die without baptism cannot be saved, though it may be altogether without their own fault that they want it. This they hold, without having either scripture or reason for it.

I proceed to speak of the Lord's supper, into which they have introduced so many gross corruptions, that it is nothing like our Lord's institution ; which further demonstrates the Romish religion to be another gospel.

I. Though Christ at the first institution of the holy supper, and in the consecration and distribution, used the vulgar tongue in which he spoke to his disciples at other times ; yet Popish priests use a language which the people do not understand, and utter the words of consecration so low that the people cannot hear them : and they denounce anathemas against all those who blame them for so doing.

II. At the first institution, our blessed Lord not only communicated himself, but enjoined his disciples to communicate with him ; and he accordingly distributed the bread and wine to them at the same time : but Papists celebrate the sacrament frequently, without any person communicating besides the priest.

III. When the people are allowed to communicate, they give them the bread only, but sacrilegiously deprive them of the cup ; contrary to Christ's institution and command ; Mat. xxvi. 27 ; 1 Cor. xi. 28 ; and contrary to the practice of the ancient church for above a thousand years after Christ. Though the Papists acknowledge Christ's plain command, and the church's long practice in this matter ; yet the council of Constance, in the year 1414, did, with a non obstante, that is, notwithstanding therefore, decree that the people should not receive the cup : and the council of Trent pronounce them accursed who say the people should receive in both kinds. This impious and impudent sacrilege, in plain contempt of Christ's authority, must be grating to every Christian ear. And had not the world at that time been dreadfully blinded and enslaved by antichrist, the people would not so easily have put up with such a wicked mutilation of Christ's blessed institution, which takes from them one help of their faith and comfort, which their Saviour in his love appointed for them. With what hearts can the church of Rome read or hear that word of him who will one day be their judge ? Mat. v. 19. "Whosoever shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven."

IV. They change both the name and the nature of this ordinance. The bible calls it the Lord's supper, the Papists call it the mass. Also they have changed it from a sacrament into a sacrifice ; from a sacrament for commemoration, into a sacrifice for propitiation, in which, they say, the mass-priest offers to God a true and proper sacrifice for the sins of the people ; which is no less than a blasphemous usurpation of the office of the Lord Jesus Christ, our great high priest, who once offered up himself a true and proper sacrifice upon the cross for his people's sins, by which one sacrifice God's justice is perfectly satisfied, and the believing soul fully secured, according to Heb. x. 12, "This man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins, for ever sat down on the right hand of God." Observe, he sat down for ever, because he judged his own sacrifice, then once offered by himself, was perfectly sufficient to atone for the sins of his people, and was never to be offered again. Nay, say the Papists, it was not so perfect, but that it must be offered over and over again ; and all this contrary to the declaration of the Spirit of God, that his sacrifice on the cross was perfect, and never needed to be repeated, Heb. vii. 27.

This sacrament was instituted for our commemorating Christ's death on the cross, and the wonderful benefits of it ; but not for our offering any sacrifice propitiatory to God, seeing Christ did this all at once, and none else can do it again, nor is there any need for it. But, in direct opposition to the Spirit of God, the Papists will have their mass to be offered, not only for thanksgiving to God for Christ's sacrifice on the cross, or in remembrance of it ; but they will have it to be a proper propitiatory sacrifice for the sins of the living and dead, and of the same virtue with that which Christ offered up on the cross : nay, they say, the same very Christ that was offered on the cross is offered in the mass. But O how vast is the difference between the two. Why? The sacrifice on the cross was the very body born of the virgin, but that offered in the mass is a piece of bread : on the cross the sacrifice had the due proportion of a man, but in the mass it is a thin wafer : on the cross there was shedding of blood, but the mass is an unbloody sacrifice. Upon all which accounts, the Popish sacrifice of the mass is justly detested by all Protestants, as being both against scripture and reason, and highly derogatory to the perfection of Christ's priesthood and sacrifice. It is absurd to have a daily repetition of a sacrifice which is perfect, or to have a sacrifice without any suffering, and a propitiation or remission without shedding of blood ; for these are all contrary to the apostle's reasoning ; Heb. ix. 22, 25, 26, 28 ; x. 12, 14. We see then the scripture directly opposite to the Papists, though this indeed is of no weight with them, who place the church or bishop of Rome above the scriptures ; so that they can dispense with them, contradict them, or put senses on them at their pleasure ; and, let them do what they will, they are still infallible, inerrable : and this fatal foundation-error must be obstinately maintained, they cannot err. Indeed, if this were once shaken, the whole fabric forthwith tumbles down, even that which they have been rearing up and propping these thousand years past.

V. They fall down before the consecrated bread, and worship it; which is gross idolatry. But I shall not again insist on this corruption, having spoken of it before.

VI. They teach, that the bread and wine, in the eucharist, are by the priest's consecration transubstantiated, or changed into the true and real body and blood of Christ; the ground they plead for it is Christ's word; 1 Cor. xi. 24, "This is my body, which is broken for you." But seeing, to take these words in a strict literal sense, would be contrary to other plain scripture-texts, as well as to our reason and senses; they must certainly be taken figuratively, as we still use to take such expressions in other places, "I am the door, the vine, that rock was Christ," &c. Besides, the apostle Paul, who recites Christ's words, and best knew their meaning, did not take them in the Popish sense; for, after the consecration of the bread, he calls it still bread, yea, three times over; 1 Cor. xi. 26—28. And Christ called the cup, after consecration, the fruit of the vine; Mat. xxvi. 29, which had not been true, if these elements had been transubstantiated. Nay, the Popish literal sense is not agreeable to the very words they build on. "This is my body which is broken;" for the Papists must own that in the strict literal sense this was not true, seeing his body was not yet broken: and consequently the words must be taken figuratively, namely, that the bread signified his body that was soon to be broken. Our Lord frequently used this figurative way of speaking to his disciples, when he called himself a door, a way, a vine, bread, &c. And they very well understood that he meant he was represented by these things, and therefore asked him no questions, as they did about other sayings of his which puzzled them. They knew such figurative expressions were most common especially about sacraments, circumcision being called the covenant, and the lamb the passover.

Likewise, this doctrine of transubstantiation is confuted by those texts which assert that Christ went bodily to heaven, and is to continue there until his second coming; and that he is to be no more bodily in the world till that time; see Acts iii. 21; John xvii. 11. Moreover, this doctrine is against the plain dictates of reason, by which we are assured, that a human body cannot be in heaven, and on earth, and in many thousand places of the earth at the same time: and also it is inconsistent with the glorified state of Christ's body to be still liable to suffering, as to be pierced, torn, burnt, corrupted, and thrown out to the dunghill. Will any man in his right senses assert, that our glorified Redeemer is yet exposed to such misery and contempt? How absurd is it to say, that Christ's body was lying on the table broken and crumbled down, while his real body was sitting by it, whole and entire, talking to his disciples! that he eat his own body, and drank his own blood! How ridiculous is it to oblige all the world to renounce their senses about these things which are the proper objects of senses! and to make them believe that those things which have the smell, taste, feeling, colour, quantity, and weight of bread and wine, are not bread and wine, but the real flesh and blood of a man! This would be to destroy the testimony of the senses altogether, and the witness of miracles to our Saviour's mission! This would be to accuse him of a weak thing, in appealing to men's senses for the truth of his miracles, and of his Messiahship, as he did when John's disciples came to him; Luke vii. 22, "Go your way, and tell John what things ye have seen and heard, that the blind see, the lame walk," &c. Also, it would have been a weak proof of his resurrection, when he appealed to the senses of his doubting disciples for their conviction, Luke xxiv. 39, "Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself; handle me and see." Neither had there been any strength in the apostle John's reasoning for the truth of Christianity, from those things which they had heard with their ears, seen with their eyes, and handled with their hands, as he doth, 1 John i. 1.

From all which we see what real disservice they do to the doctrine of Christianity, who labour to establish the doctrine of transubstantiation. They go about to destroy the great evidence of the first witnesses to the Christian religion, by overturning all their demonstrative arguments from it, from the resurrection of Christ from the dead, and from the great miracles which he and his apostles wrought for confirming their doctrine: for, if we cannot believe our eyes, ears, or feeling; nor be sure of what we see, hear, or handle; all these primitive arguments were good for nothing. Nay, more than that, it could be to no effect to read the bible, or cite any text to prove any one article of our faith: for how can we make it appear that the words we cite are really there, if we cannot trust our eyes? And how else are the Papists sure that the words are there which they build so much on, "This is my body?" Thus this monstrous doctrine of the Papists even destroys itself, as it would also destroy the whole bible, and foundations of Christianity.

It is nowise to the purpose for Papists to allege that this doctrine is a mystery like that of the Trinity, and not to be examined by our reason or senses: for that of transubstantiation is an object of our senses, which the glorious Trinity and nature of God is not; likewise, the doctrine of the Trinity is plainly and frequently declared in scripture, which the other is not. Nor can they say, it is a contradiction in itself, to assert three persons in one Godhead, more than three lines in one triangle; or an understanding, will, and memory in one soul. Though indeed the three divine persons in one Godhead, is a far more incomprehensible mystery. But, seeing the changing of one corporal thing into another is a plain object of sense and reason, what cruel monsters must Papists be, who would put all to the most tormenting death who do not believe this absurd and monstrous doctrine of theirs, which hath no foundation in sense or reason, more than in scripture, but is directly contrary to all the three! Yet it is well known, that this of transubstantiation was the burning doctrine in queen Mary's reign, and the very test by which the valiant martyrs were tried and condemned to the fire. May God pity these lands, and preserve them from the return of this absurd, monstrous, and cruel religion, and all its abettors!

Eleventh Arg. That religion which is calculated to hinder the instruction, edification, and comfort of Christians in their journey to heaven, is another gospel than that of Jesus Christ, yea, the very reverse of Christianity: but Popery is such a religion; therefore, &c.

It is manifest from the word, and from universal experience in all places where true Christianity is taught and practised, that it is the plain scope and design of the gospel and religion of Jesus, to instruct, edify, and comfort his people in their way to eternal happiness; see Mat. xxviii. 20; 1 Cor. xiv. 5, 26; 2 Cor. xii. 19; Eph. iv. 12; Rom. xv. 4.

But it is as manifest that the Romish religion tends to obstruct their instruction, edification, and comfort, sundry ways, as by locking up the holy scriptures, these fountains of light and comfort, from the people in the Latin tongue, and forbidding them to read them. Also, by their having their prayers, hymns, and public service, in worshipping of God and administering the sacraments, in the Latin tongue, which few understand. All this is directly contrary to the scriptures, and to the practice of the apostolic and ancient churches for many ages. Pray, for what end was it that God gave the gift of tongues to the apostles and primitive pastors, but that they might instruct and edify the people wherever they travelled, by teaching, preaching, and performing divine worship and service in the vulgar language of every country to which they came? We see also the Spirit of God enjoins all his ministers to study and do all things for the people's edification, 1 Cor. xiv. 26. And, in order to this, he declares it necessary that they should speak to them in a language they understood: "For how," saith he, "shall he that is unlearned say Amen at thy giving of thanks, seeing he understandeth not not what thou sayest?" 1 Cor. i. 16. "For if I know not the meaning of the voice, he that speaketh shall be a barbarian to me," &c. 1 Cor. xiv. 11.

Likewise, the Romish religion obstructs the comfort of the people of God, by suspending the validity of sacraments upon the intention of the priest, and the efficacy of the priest's absolution upon the fulness of the penitent's confession. Also, their doctrine about purgatory is very comfortless to the poor, who want money to purchase their deliverance from it. Likewise, they obstruct the comfort of Christians, by denying that they can in this life attain the assurance of pardon, or of their being in a state of grace, though the scriptures afford us many instances of such as have attained it, and direct all Christians to give all diligence to make their calling and election sure; see 1 John iii. 14, 19, 24; v. 13; Rom. v. 2, 5; 2 Cor. v. 1; 2 Pet. i. 10. May the Lord bless his word. Amen.

SERMON V.

"BUT THOUGH WE, OR AN ANGEL FROM HEAVEN, PREACH ANY OTHER GOSPEL TO YOU, THAN THAT WHICH WE HAVE PREACHED UNTO YOU, LET HIM BE ACCURSED," GAL. I. 8.

As the errors and deviations of Popery from the scriptures are numerous, so our arguments are manifold to prove it another gospel. Wherefore I proceed to add, in the next place,

A Twelfth Arg. That religion which derogates from the efficacy of Christ's blood to cleanse from all sin, or denies the sufficiency and fulness of Christ's satisfaction and sufferings to atone for and purge away sin, and therefore teaches the necessity of our personal satisfactions and sufferings for that end, both here and in purgatory hereafter; that religion is another gospel: but Popery is such a religion; and therefore, &c.

All Protestants, according to the scriptures, maintain, that there is an infinite sufficiency and fulness in the vicarious obedience and sufferings of Christ, to satisfy divine justice for the sins of an elect world; so that by "one offering he hath perfected for ever them that are sanctified," Heb. x. 14. And that the blood of Jesus Christ alone cleanseth believers from all sin, and that there is no further condemnation to them that believe in him; for God fully forgives their iniquities, and he remembers their sins no more; see 1 John i. 7; Rom. viii. 1; Jer. xxxi. 34.

But Papists maintain, that, besides the sufferings of Christ, there is need for the satisfactions and sufferings of believers by penance here, and hereafter in purgatory, if they have not fulfilled due penance, in order to purge away their sins, and prepare them for heaven, where no unclean thing can enter. They say, purgatory is a place of torment in the other world near hell, to which the souls go of those who die in a state of grace, but are not sufficiently purged from their sins here; and there they continue under a tormenting fire, till they have made full satisfaction for their sins, which perhaps may be many hundreds or thousands of years to some. But, they say, the time of punishment may be shortened by the prayers and merits of others, by soul-masses, and by indulgences, which can be obtained by money. These indulgences come originally from the Pope, who hath power of remitting punishments in purgatory: and this power of indulgence is founded upon works of supererogation, that is, the overplus of the satisfactions and merits of Christ and the saints, laid up in a treasure of which the Pope keeps the key, and dispenses portions thereof to particular persons as he pleases. But all this story of purgatory, and of the Pope's power, is without any foundation in scripture, yea, it is contrary to it. It is horrid presumption and blasphemy, to go to join the merits of men with the merits of Christ, and to hold that a man on earth hath power to dispose of these merits, and to remit punishments inflicted by divine justice in another world, and to do all this for money.

As for the Popish purgatory, it is nothing but a fiction contrived for secular and sordid purposes; for the scriptures know no such place, nor any purgatory for sin but the blood of Christ, 1 John i. 7. Likewise, we learn from the scriptures, that the souls of all men, when they leave the body at death, are presently fixed in an unalterable state either of happiness or misery; that there is no intermediate place between them, nor any passage from the one to the other; see Luke xvi. 22, 23, 26. Again, it is contrary to scripture, to say that any who die in a state of grace, enter into purgatory or a place of torment: for the bible declares them "blessed who die in the Lord," or die in a gracious state, because they enter into rest, and into peace, where they are with Christ, and enjoy his blessed presence. All this is clear from Rev. xiv. 13; Isa. lvii. 2; Phil. i. 23, and from the instance of the thief that repented on the cross; he was with Christ in paradise that very day he died, though he had been a great sinner, and needed purging as much as any. And if the blood of Christ purged him from sin, and fitted him for heaven all at once, why should Papists seek another purgatory to themselves, when the bible knows no other? They can never imagine that paradise, or the blessed rest which believers enter into at death, is any thing like their purgatory, which, they say, hath in it a tormenting fire little inferior to that of hell, only it is temporary. No, no; the believer's blessed rest after death is a place of happiness, void of all trouble or torment. We see, then, that the Papists' purgatory is contrary to the bible, and highly injurious to the infinite virtue of Christ's blood, and the perfection of his satisfaction, and is a plain denying of the fulness and sufficiency of it; which is another gospel than Christ and his apostles teach us. Again, how scandalously partial and uncharitable is the Pope's way of dispensing his treasure of merits? The wealthier sort may share of it, and redeem their own souls, and the souls of their friends, out of this fiery prison, by their money; while the poor must fry in the flame without hope of pardon or relief till the last judgment. Now, if it be in the Pope's power to deliver miserable souls out of this tormenting fire at his pleasure, what a cruel inhumane man must he be, that lets multitudes of the poor lie howling and broiling in it, and will not bestow heaps of his vast treasure upon them, to ransom them from this scorching oven!

Let me here remark, that it is the Popish doctrine of purgatory that is the foundation of their prayers for the dead. The Papists judge themselves bound to pray for the souls of their friends, that they may be delivered from the dreadful pains of purgatory. Though there be no ground for such prayers in scripture, or in the practice of the first ages, yet it is to be regretted that not a few called Protestants begin to debate for them. But if there be no purgatory, as I have showed there is not, then there is no place for prayers for the dead. It appears from the forecited verses, Luke xvi. 22, 23, 26, that the souls of all men, after their departure from the body, are immediately fixed in a state unalterable. The godly go presently to Abraham's bosom, a place of glorious rest and perfection, Heb. xii. 23, where they need no prayers; the wicked go to a prison, out of which there is no redemption, where no prayer can help them, the sentence against them being irrevocable. Where the tree falleth, there it must lie. So that praying for the dead is a practice unscriptural and unwarrantable.

Thirteenth Arg. That religion which is attended with a spirit of persecution, a spirit which breathes cruelty against fellow-christians or fellow-men, is another gospel, surely not the gospel of Christ, but of antichrist: but Popery is such a religion; therefore, &c.

The Christian religion, or gospel of Christ, teaches us goodness and mercy, meekness, patience, and tender-dealing, that so we may resemble our God and Saviour, Luke vi. 36, "Be ye therefore merciful, as your Father in heaven also is merciful." Eph. iv. 32, "Be kind to one another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you." 2 Tim. ii. 24, 25, "Be gentle unto all men, apt to teach, patient, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves." Luke ix. 56, "For the Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them." From these and other texts we see what is the spirit and temper of true Christianity.

But the spirit of Popery breathes out persecution and violence, oppression and cruelty. They avowedly plead for propagating religion by force of arms, by blood and slaughter; and so would cut men's throats to save their souls. They lay it down for a principle, that heretics are to be burnt; and such they judge all Protestants to be: and their practice is most agreeable to their principle. Many instances might be brought of the cruel antichristian spirit of Popery, yea, so many as would fill several volumes. I will mention a few.

Long and cruel was the persecution raised by the Pope against the Waldenses and Albigenses, which began anno 1160, and continued for several centuries. The Pope instigated many kings and princes to destroy them; and a great many thousands of them were most cruelly butchered at many different times, but more especially in the year 1545. Bellarmine confesseth in his writings, that one hundred thousand of them were cut off in one expedition that year.

The Pope excited the emperors, kings, princes, dukes, &c. to take up arms against the Bohemians, for protesting against the church of Rome; intreating by the wounds of Christ, and their own salvation, to extirpate that cursed generation; promising pardon of all their sins to the most wicked persons that killed any of them. Many thousands of them were destroyed by various tortures and cruel deaths, as Clark narrates in his Martyrology.

Dreadful was the cruelty of the duke de Alva, while he was governor of the Netherlands, under the king of Spain: he boasted that he had in a short time put eighteen thousand in the hand of the hangman for heresy, besides many thousands massacred by his bloody soldiers.

Terrible was the massacre in Paris, anno 1572, contrived by the Pope and court of Rome; above ten thousand Protestants were murdered in Paris in cold blood in one night's time: and, after that, many thousands through France were butchered in the same manner, the news whereof were received at Rome with the greatest expressions of joy.

During the five years of queen Mary's reign in England, notwithstanding of her solemn promise to the men of Suffolk in favour of the Protestant religion, great cruelties were exercised against Protestants by these furious bloody bishops Gardiner and Bonner; and many godly and learned bishops, ministers, and others, in England, were condemned to the flames, and burnt alive.

Likewise, the gun-powder plot of the Papists, discovered November 5th, 1604, was a fearful instance of their hellish wickedness and cruelty, when they designed to have blown up the king, the prince, and both houses of Parliament all at once, and all to re-establish Popery in these lands.

There were many terrible massacres of Protestants in several towns of Germany, anno 1630, and following years, by the emperor's general, count Tilly and his soldiers, who killed vast numbers of them in cold blood, using the most unheard-of barbarities against all sexes, ages, and conditions. So that many have observed, that so great hath the malice and rage of Papists been against the professors of the gospel, that neither Turks nor heathens ever exceeded or equalled them: no instances among them can be given like to the inhuman barbarities, or rather devilish cruelties of the Spanish inquisition, which no man of bowels is able to read without horror!

I have neither time nor room to give so much as hints of the bloody persecutions and Popish butcheries of Protestants in Scotland, England, Low Countries, France, Spain, Italy, Piedmont, Germany, Hungary, Bohemia, Lithuania, Poland, and other places, whereby many hundred thousands have been murdered, tortured, and destroyed in the most barbarous manner; for which see Clark's Martyrology, Fox, Thuanus, and several Popish historians, as well as Protestants.

Yet I cannot altogether pass that terrible massacre in Ireland, when the Papists rose on the 23d day of October, 1641, and murdered, in cold blood, about one hundred thousand Protestants; the memory whereof is still solemnized on that day every year, in all the churches of Ireland, by act of parliament; and it was reckoned they massacred at least another hundred thousand after the foresaid day, before their cruelty stopt. The priests were the chief instigators in this massacre; for they gave the sacrament to divers Irish, upon condition that they would spare neither man, woman, nor child of the Protestants; assuring them, that it was as lawful to kill a Protestant, as to kill a dog; yea, that it was meritorious to wash their hands in their blood; that the killing of Protestants was a rare preservative against the pains of purgatory, and that the murderers would go straight to heaven when they died. They, among other of their cruelties, caused women kill their own husbands and children, by putting swords in their hands, and thrusting them forward; and thus they caused children kill their parents. They also taught their own children to kill the children of Protestants, and to use barbarities upon dead bodies, &c.

These few instances are sufficient to prove

Popery to be plainly antichristianism, and another gospel than that of the meek and merciful Jesus; and that the character of the whore of Babylon is justly applied by Protestants to the church of Rome, which we have in Rev. xvii. 6, "And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus." A horrid spectacle! to see a woman take so much delight in cruelty, as to drink blood! and the blood of Christ's saints! Therefore the apostle John adds there, "And when I saw her, I wondered with great admiration!" Why? As if he had said, I had not wondered so much to see Mahometans, or see Roman Pagans shedding the blood of Christ's saints; but to see the church of Rome, that pretends to be the spouse of Christ, shedding the blood of so many thousands and millions of Christ's most sincere friends and subjects, for no crime or cause whatsoever, but merely for owning the authority of the Lord Jesus, and professing his truths as he hath left them in his word; this sight was most affecting, and matter of amazement to the blessed apostle! And it may also be most amazing to us, that the patience of the righteous Judge of heaven and earth should bear so long with the bloody whore! But he hath a set time for judgment.

Indeed, Protestants in Britain, when observing the smooth and civil behaviour of sundry Papists living among them, may be apt to entertain charitable thoughts of them, that they are not inclined to such cruelty against Protestants: but some Popish writers are so ingenuous as to tell us, that it is want of power, and not of good-will, that makes them spare us. And though some of that communion seem to abhor cruelty, yet their religion binds them to break through every engagement of friendship, gratitude, promises, or oaths, to destroy us, when it is in their power; as appears by the decrees of sundry councils and Popes which are cited before. And these decrees Popish princes and states, and all others, are required to obey upon pain of their salvation. And these who obey are assured by the Pope of all these indulgences and privileges which were granted to the adventurers for the recovery of the Holy Land, namely, to have a full pardon of all their sins here, and a greater measure of glory hereafter. So that Papists, who believe their own principles, must needs be cruel to Protestants.

Fourteenth Arg. That religion which is not instituted and authorized by Jesus Christ, the sole Head of the church, but devised and appointed by antichrist, his great enemy, must be another gospel, and liable to the anathema of the text: but Popery is such a religion; therefore, &c.

I have showed before, that Christ hath left us his religion or gospel in his word, and that we are to look to his word as our only rule of faith, worship, and practice in religious matters, and to reject all human inventions inconsistent therewith.

I have also mentioned the Popish doctrines and practices which Protestants reject as contrary to the rule. And these have been gradually devised and brought in by the church and bishops of Rome, as is evident from the histories and writings of sundry Popish, as well as Protestant authors, who mention the particular times and years when these doctrines and practices were broached and introduced. Now, these being expressly contrary to the revealed will of Christ, and to his honour and glory, cannot be reckoned Christianity, but the reverse of it, or antichristianism, devised by antichrist, Christ's grand enemy. It is well known, that the body of sound Protestants hold the Pope and church of Rome to be antichrist, mentioned by the apostle John; 1 John ii. 18; and the man of sin and son of perdition, mentioned by the apostle Paul; 2 Thes. ii. 3, 4; and the seducing spirits spoken of, 2 Tim. iv. 1. The doctrines and practices confuted in preceding arguments being so plainly antichristian, we may well conclude the broachers and propagators of them to be antichrist, namely, the Pope and his hierarchy. Likewise other scripture-marks of antichrist well agree to them.

In the first place, let us take a view of the seat of antichrist, or the city where he is to reside and govern. 1. The city is called mystical Babylon; Rev. xvii. 5. Now, Rome may well get that name, because of her resembling old Babylon in her idolatry, and oppressing the true church of God. Sundry Papists hold, that Rome is meant by Babylon in 1 Pet. v. 13, and why not also in other texts?

2. The city is situated upon seven hills; Rev. xvii. 9. Now, Rome is the only city we read of that is famed for such a situation; the names of the hills being, Palatinus, Aventinus, Quirinalis, Celius, Viminalis, Esquilinus, Capitolinus.

3. It is a city that had seven kings, that is, seven forms of government, before antichrist, called the beast, reigned in it, who is therefore called the eighth. Five of these were fallen before John's time, the sixth was then in being, and the seventh was to come; according to Rev. xvii. 10, 11. All this agrees exactly to Rome with her seven forms of government; 1. Kings. 2. Consuls. 3. Tribunes. 4. Decemviri. 5. Dictators. 6. Emperors Pagan, then in being. 7. Emperors Christian, which were to come. And the beast, or antichristian monarch, is the eighth, ver. 11.; and there he is said to be of the seventh, because of his having a mixed power, made up partly of the civil power of the seventh head, and partly of an ecclesiastical power super-added to it. And observe, it is said of the seventh, ver. 10, that he was to continue a short space. Why? The Pope soon wrested Rome and Italy from the Christian emperor, and usurped his power.

4. This city, or great whore, where antichrist reigns, is said to "sit upon many waters, and to reign over the kings of the earth," Rev. xvii. 1, 18, and these waters are expounded, ver. 15, to be "multitudes of people, nations, and tongues;" which agrees well to Rome, that hath many nations of different languages depending on her authority; and to the Pope, who hath had a mighty influence upon the kings of Europe, to make war against their neighbours, and to persecute their subjects at his pleasure; and sometimes hath caused them to do penance, resign their crowns, and receive them again as a gift from him, &c.

5. This city is called the "great whore, the mother of harlots, with whom the kings of the earth have committed fornication," and the inhabitants of the earth have been made drunk with the wine of her fornication; see Rev. xvii. 1, 2, 5. These characters are most applicable to the church of Rome, because of her apostacy and gross idolatry, by which she hath gone a-whoring from God, and hath wofully ensnared the kings and nations of the world into it with her. I showed before why idolatry is called fornication and whoredom, and is compared to wine.

6. This is called the "beast that hath ten horns," by which are meant ten "kings, which were to receive their power with the beast, and give their power and strength to her;" see Rev. xvii. 12, 13. This suits well with Rome! for, in Pope Leo X.'s time there were just ten kings submitting, namely, in Germany, France, England, Scotland, Denmark, Poland, Spain, Navarre, Hungary, Naples. And though these kingdoms have since undergone many alterations, yet still the bounds of the Roman empire keep pretty much about the number of ten kingdoms or sovereign states.

These characters being so plainly applicable to Rome, many Papists grant that Rome is to be the seat of antichrist; but, to save the Pope, refuse it to be Rome papal that is meant, but Rome Pagan, or Rome when she falls off from the Pope to Paganism. And they will have it that antichrist is yet to come, and will continue only three years and a half; and that the two witnesses, Enoch and Elias, will come from heaven to destroy him.

But by what is said, and by the marks following, joined therewith, it is most evident that he is come already, and that the Pope who sits at Rome is the very antichrist described in the word of God.

Consider these things further. 1. The bible tells us, that antichrist was to rise by a great apostacy or falling away from Christianity, which was to come gradually to a great height, 2 Thes.

ii. This apostacy is called the mystery of iniquity, v. 7, that began to work in the apostles' days, namely, by the antichristian ambition, like that of Diotrephes, then working under ground, and which at length made way for antichrist's open appearance.

2. The great let, which withheld antichrist's coming in the apostles' time, is now taken out of the way, 2 Thes. ii. 6, 7. That let was the heathen empire or Roman emperor, and so the primitive Christians understood it; which made sundry of the ancients wish for the continuance of the Roman empire, because of the terror they were under of that great adversary's appearing upon the destruction thereof.

3. That the Pope is antichrist, appears from 2 Thes. ii. 4, where he is said to "sit as God in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." Now, as God resided in the temple of Jerusalem, and was worshipped there, so the Pope sits in the Church at Rome, usurping God's prerogatives, titles, and honours, as I showed before; and the Papists ascribe divine power to him, to forgive sin, dispense with God's laws, make duty to be sin, and sin to be duty; to open and shut heaven and hell at his pleasure.

4. He is said, 2 Thes. ii. 4, to "exalt himself above all that is called God, or is worshipped." This the Pope doth sundry ways: 1. He exalts himself above the God of heaven, by annulling his commands, hallowing the very stewes, and many gross acts of impiety, and demanding stricter obedience to his own laws than to God's laws: and by pretending to do things which Omnipotence cannot do, such as things sinful, or things which imply contradiction. He can make God of a piece of bread, a whole Christ of a thin wafer, a body without quantity, extension, weight, or colour; the same small body to be in millions of places, in heaven and earth, at the same moment of time. 2. The Pope exalts himself above magistrates who are called gods, by treading on the necks of emperors, kicking off the crowns of kings, deposing them, loosing their subjects from their allegiance, disposing of their dominions and lives, exempting his ecclesiastics from their jurisdiction, even in temporal causes, contrary to God's command, Rom. xiii. 1. And he hath his Janissaries, the Jesuits, still going through the world, promoting plots and conspiracies against Protestant kings and kingdoms. By which ungodly practices, he hath filled the world with blood and confusion, with long and cruel wars, and with the secret murder of princes and others.

5. There is another prophecy that agrees with that before-mentioned, of a great apostacy under the gospel, which is most applicable to the Pope and his church, 1 Tim. iv. 1—3, when men shall receive the doctrine of demons, that is, doctrines which teach the worship of saints and angels, in imitation of the demon worship of the heathens, that is, a middle sort of deities between the supreme God and mortal men, whose office it is to be agents or mediators between the gods above, and men below. Speaking lies in hypocrisy, that is, promoting their errors by lies and forgeries, fabulous legends, and lying miracles; professing honour to Christ, while they undermine his priesthood, disparage his sacrifice, and corrupt his ordinances. They forbid marriage to some, and encourage nuns' vows; which leads to manifold mischiefs, lewdness, and villany; and all this contrary to the mind of the Spirit of God; Heb. xiii. 4; 1 Cor. ix. 5; vii. 2; 1 Tim. iii. 7. They command abstinence from certain meats, as from flesh on certain days, without any warrant from God, who on the contrary has freed Christians from such yokes under the gospel.

6. The whore is said to be arrayed in scarlet, Rev. xvii. 4, which is literally true of the Pope and his cardinals, who wear hats, robes, stockings, and shoes of scarlet colour, and will not change their livery, though they know how we apply this text.

7. Their merchandize is gold, silver, slaves, and souls of men, Rev. xviii. 12, 13. So the Pope and his clergy trade by enslaving men, redeeming souls out of purgatory for money, opening heaven by pardons for gold and silver; so that none go to hell but the poor who want money, or those who are not willing to part with it.

8. The whore is said to "make the nations drunk with her wine," Rev. xvii. 2. So the Pope and his clergy so intoxicate people's minds with their superstitious doctrines and worship, that let them be guilty of never so many errors and blasphemies, or impose on them what they will, they believe they cannot err; and they are ready to kill and murder all who say the contrary.

9. The whore is said to be drunk with the blood of Christ's martyrs, Rev. xvii. 6. This is true of the Pope and his church with a witness, as I showed before, &c.

What I have advanced amounts to a plain demonstration that Popery is another gospel, and the religion of antichrist, and therefore to be abhorred.

I shall touch at a common objection of Papists against the religion of Protestants, from its novelty. "Where was your religion," say they, "before Luther arose," anno 1517?

Ans. Our religion and doctrines were there, where theirs never was, namely, in the bible. And they were also with the universal Christian church for five or six hundred years after Christ's ascension, during all which time the Popish doctrines were not heard of. And, even in the most dark and corrupt ages, Christ had his faithful witnesses, long before Luther, to maintain these very truths we profess; such as the Waldenses, Albigenses, the Wickliffites, Hussites, and many others. But let us, in our turn, ask the Papists, "Where was your religion for the first six hundred years after Christ?" Let them show, if they can, where all that time was the doctrine of transubstantiation: where was the Pope's supremacy or infallibility? Where image-worship, praying in an unknown tongue, communion in one kind? Where was purgatory? Works of supererogation, giving dispensations or pardons, selling indulgences? and many such things. They were not then conceived, nor come forth of antichrist's womb. Christ's church in those more early ages knew them not. No; these things are all Romish corruptions and Popish innovations, brought into the church since these times. So that the character of novelty properly belongs to their religion, not to ours. We have true antiquity on our side, the ancient records of the scriptures, and the ancient practice of the apostolic and primitive church, which they have no claim to. May the Lord bless his own word! Amen.

SERMON VI.

"BUT THOUGH WE, OR AN ANGEL FROM HEAVEN, PREACH ANY OTHER GOSPEL UNTO YOU, THAN THAT WHICH WE HAVE PREACHED UNTO YOU, LET HIM BE ACCURSED, OR BE UNDER AN ANATHEMA," GAL. 1. 8.

In the preceding sermons, I have demonstrated that Popery is another gospel than Christ's; that the absurdities of it are so shocking in their nature, so contrary to sound reason, to the light of nature, as well as to the light of scripture, that it is amazing to think how any thinking man; that hath lived under gospel-light, can have any favourable notion of Popery! I say, of such a late invented religion as Popery!

A religion, to sum up what I have said of it in few words, that makes many new articles of faith and practice, both without foundation in scripture, and expressly contrary to scripture.

A religion that prescribes new terms of salvation, new conditions of remission of sin, which Christ doth not require, as confession in the priest's ear, owning the Pope, the church of Rome, &c.

A religion that makes the way to heaven broader than Christ makes it, that requires no other faith to justify men than may be found in devils, namely, an assent to the truth of what God hath revealed: that requires attrition for contrition, the Opus operatum, or mere formality in devotion, as sufficient in penance, in prayers, and partaking of sacraments: that requires idle devices of men's contriving, yea, many childish and fantastical ceremonies in divine service, instead of the spiritual worship of the invisible God; as if God looked more to outward actions than to inward affections; or as if he regarded the tongue and hands more than the heart!

A religion that corrupts men's morals, and opens the door to sin and wickedness, by allowing dispensations, indulgences, and pardons, buying and selling of sins and souls, for money or some outward penance; so that none who have money, however flagitious, need go to hell, or stay long in purgatory! A religion that allows perjury, the breaking the most solemn leagues and oaths, murder, and the most wicked means for promoting the interest of their church; that allows juggling equivocations and reserved senses, in taking oaths which should end controversies: that tolerates open brothels, and prefers fornication in many to honourable matrimony; that gently excuses gross breaches of God's law with the name of venials, and dares to affirm that venial sins are no hinderance to our perfection!

A religion so uncharitable as to deny salvation to all them that are out of their church; and yet so cruel as to refuse the true means of salvation to those that are in it, such as reading the scriptures, performing of public worship, prayers, and praises, in a known language!

A religion that reproaches the true scriptures of God with obscurity, imperfection, and insufficiency to salvation without their traditions: that makes more canonical scriptures than ever God made, or the ancient church received; and thunders out curses against those who will not add them to God's book, without regarding God's awful threatening, "If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book!"

A religion that exalts a poor sinful man above the holy scriptures, and makes him the infallible interpreter of them and judge of controversies: that gives him absolute power to gloss and control the scriptures as he pleases; to dispense with God's laws, to make new laws of his own, and new articles of faith binding the conscience, and to impose them upon men upon pain of salvation: that gives him power also to make sin, forgive sin, remit punishment, dispense with duty to God and duty to man, open and shut heaven and hell at his pleasure!

A religion that errs damnably in the fundamental doctrine of justification: that overturns the doctrine of free grace and sufficiency of Christ's merits, and maintains that there is worth and merit in men's polluted doings for procuring pardon and salvation from God; and so will have men still to be saved by a covenant of works, when God assures us it must only be by a covenant of grace, and that no man's works can justify him before a holy God!

A religion that audaciously contradicts the plainest laws and commands of the great God of heaven and earth: that requires men to bow down to a graven image, when God saith, You shall not: that requires men to worship and pray to diverse creatures, when God saith, "Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God only;" that requires men to use many mediators, when God said, there is "but one Mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus:" that forbids men to read the scriptures, when God commands them to do it: that forbids men to pray in a known tongue, when God requires them to do it: that forbids men to drink of the sacramental cup, when God commands them to drink it; that prohibits certain men to marry, when God declares "marriage is honourable in all:" that forbids them to be subject to the higher powers, when God requires "every soul to be subject" to them!

A religion that justifies and encourages idolatry, when God declares it to be an abomination to him, and a damnable sin!

A religion which makes nature vainly proud, in making her co-partner with Christ in our salvation, and giving place for boasting in the creature, and glorying in human works and merits; when God's design is to exclude all such boasting, that all our glorying may be in God through Jesus Christ!

A religion that puffs up a man with a vain conceit of perfection here, and of his ability to do even more than God requires, and so to merit salvation for others as well as for himself!

A religion that miserably corrupts the two sacraments of Christ's institution, and adds to them five of their own: that sends poor infants to hell, for want of that which they could not live to desire!

A religion that turns the sacrament, which Christ appointed for commemoration, into a sacrifice for propitiation: that overturns the human nature of Christ, by giving it ten thousand places at once, and properly no place; making it a substance without quantity, a body without extension, weight, or colour, which can neither be felt nor seen!

A religion that overturns the testimony of the senses, with respect to things which are the proper objects of sense, and thereby shakes the convincing arguments brought from Christ's resurrection and miracles for the Christian religion, and likewise every proof brought from a scripture text for any divine truth; which even would destroy Christianity 'tself, and transubstantiation with it!

A religion that racks the consciences of men, and robs Christians of all sound comfort; while it teacheth, that the assurance of the pardon of our sins is not attainable here; that the virtue of the priest's absolution depends upon the fulness of the penitent's confession; that we cannot be certain if we receive the true sacraments of God, seeing we cannot know the intention of the minister, without which they are no sacraments!

A religion that presumes to mingle Christ's last institution and legacy to his church, and rob his people of the one half of that heavenly provision that their loving Redeemer hath appointed for their refreshment and comfort!

A religion that teacheth men to put confidence in crucifixes, images, beads, roses, Agnus Deis, hallowed bells, and swords, spells of the gospel and such baubles, and to ascribe divine virtue to them, as much as to Christ and his precious blood!

A religion that allows the greatest absurdities, and the most horrible blasphemies that can be uttered; such as giving God's titles and prerogatives to sinful men, as the Popes of Rome; giving power to men to make the infinite God of a piece of bread, and power to a creature to command the great Jehovah, &c.

A religion that breathes forth nothing but cruelty, blood, and slaughter, against all those who cannot fall in with its monstrous absurdities and blasphemies!

A religion that depends upon the infallibility of a man at Rome, that, be his personal errors or immoralities never so gross or scandalous, yet in his pontifical chair and decisions he cannot err. O! a miserable foundation of Popish faith! and yet they have no better for it! How astonishing is it to see so many nations venturing their salvation upon such a bottom!

I shall now conclude these discourses against Popery with some advices, which, through the divine blessing, may be further useful as preservatives against it.

I. Keep up a thankful sense of the Lord's distinguishing goodness to you in this land, in making the light of Reformation to shine these two hundred years past, for discovering the delusions of Popery, and saving you from them. Unthankfulness to God for mercies is a sin that provokes God to deprive an unworthy people of them. Therefore be thankful to God, that you were born in a land of gospel-light, and not of Popish darkness. Bless God, that you were not educated and taught to worship images, to pray to saints, tell your beads, to believe as the church believes, that is, to give implicit faith and blind obedience to the church of Rome, and to be content to know no more of the bible than their priests tell you. Bless God, that you have God's worship in a known tongue, bibles in your own language; that you are not obliged to hide them, but have liberty to use them, under the protection of Protestant kings and magistrates; and that you are not under the power of Papists, who would take your bodies and bibles and burn them together, as was sometimes the case in this land, and is so at present in other lands. And might Papists, and those who have risen up in arms to join them, have their will, God knows how soon you might be in the same case again!

O how thankful were the Israelites for the light they had in Goshen, when all Egypt around them was veiled with darkness! Surely your light is far preferable to theirs! (I mean the light of the holy bible you are privileged with). Your light discovers to you who is the only object of worship, in whose name, and by whose mediation you are to worship him, and whose righteousness it is that can justify you. You have true bible-worship and ordinances, sacraments and sermons dispensed with plainness and power, which Popish nations have not. And what a mercy is it to have pure bible-religion in the land, without the unhallowed mixtures of antichrist! O then thank God for our glorious Reformation from Popery, and for raising up and spiriting our blessed Reformers to venture their all to bring clear gospel-light unto you. And give him thanks for raising up that renowned hero, king William, in 1688, to dispel Popish darkness when likely to have overspread these lands anew; and to bless us with a more firm establishment of the Protestant religion, than ever heretofore, by settling the succession to the crown in the Protestant line in the illustrious house now in possession of it. Let us then show our gratitude to God, by doing all we can for preserving this settlement, and for maintaining our rightful sovereign, king George, and his royal issue, in the enjoyment of the crown entailed upon him by the free choice of these three nations, against all those who are now combined against him; especially seeing we are solemnly engaged and sworn to cleave to this royal family, and under its shadow we have long enjoyed the invaluable blessing of pure religion, precious liberty, and excellent laws, without any infringement upon them: and it is visibly our interest so to do, seeing the preservation of the entail in this royal family is the only probable means, under God, for supporting the establishment of our religion, laws, and liberties, against Popery, tyranny, and slavery. Let no Protestant then suffer himself to be deluded into a coolness for a Protestant cause and government, by the artful speeches and flatteries of Papists, who are irreconcilable enemies both to our holy religion and happy constitution.

II. If you would be kept from seduction into Popish errors, make the scriptures of truth your study; for these are your best defence against Popery. It is the bible, the holy bible, that is the religion of Protestants; and a noble foundation it is for our most holy faith. Then read it carefully; and, though the Pope forbids you to do it, no matter, seeing Christ bids you search the scriptures, John v. 39. Why? They are the rule of your faith, the charter of your privileges, the treasure of your comforts, and ground of your eternal hopes. No wonder though Papists be against the scriptures; for the scriptures are plainly against them, as I have evidently showed. As the bible knows them not, so antiquity is ignorant of them, and reason also renounces them. And, seeing it is so, their best arguments for their absurd doctrines and ridiculous worship are tyranny and cruelty, swords and stakes, murders and massacres, and the terror of burning and torture. But, my friends, let scripture-truth be your shield and buckler against such arguments, and then you need not be afraid of the Romish pestilence that walks in darkness, nor of her barbarous destruction that wastes at noon-day. God himself will be your sanctuary, and the covert of blood your safeguard. It is well known, that scripture-weapons stab Popery to the heart: seek skill then from the Holy Spirit, that framed them, how to manage them; and particularly seek to be well instructed from the word in the great fundamental article of justification by imputed righteousness, and the vanity and sinfulness of trusting to human works and merits. Those who learn Christ, and salvation by free grace, from the scriptures, will not be seduced from the truth by the devices of Papists: wherefore still keep in mind to tell seducers, "To the law and to the testimony, if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them," Isa. viii. 20.

III. Labour to maintain and keep up the zeal of your worthy ancestors against Popery, and whatever leads to it. Remember what zeal they manifested against it at our Reformation, how our nobility, gentry, ministers, citizens, commons, and persons of all ranks, entered into associations and solemn covenants to withstand the errors and delusions of Popery; and many ventured upon great sufferings and cruel deaths before they would embrace them. And, when they dreaded the return of them at the Spanish armada, in 1588, there was great fasting, prayer, and humiliation over all the land, besides all necessary outward preparations to defend themselves and their religion against Popish invaders.

How great was the zeal of the bishops in Ireland in the reign of king Charles I., when a legal toleration of Popery in that kingdom was proposed? The Protestant bishops there met, and signed a protestation against it, Nov. 26, 1626, in which are these words: "The religion of Papists is superstitious and idolatrous, and their church apostatical: to give them therefore a toleration is a grievous sin, because it makes ourselves accessory to all the abominations of Popery, and to the perdition of those souls that perish thereby. We therefore beseech the God of truth to make those who are in authority zealous for God's glory, and resolute against all Popery, superstition, and idolatry." This protestation was signed by archbishop Usher and eleven of his brethren. Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, vol. ii. p. 185.

Great also was the zeal of our fathers against Popery at our happy revolution, 1688, when both the representatives of England and Scotland fell happily in with the prince of Orange's expedition to relieve us from it, in opposition to a Popish king, with a great army, then reigning. What pity is it then that our zeal should cool through length of time! that Scotland, once so zealous, should be said to favour a Popish cause or interest! when it is certain that Popery continues to be the same idolatrous, blasphemous, bloody, and damnable thing it was in our fathers' days! O let us abhor Popery, as they did, as it is another gospel, contrary to the gospel of Christ, and subversive of it; in regard it perverts Christianity, and makes such corrupt additions to it, that are destructive both of its doctrine and morals. Wherefore, however Papists disguise their abominable errors and practices, let us be resolved, like our fathers, stedfastly to maintain that antichrist is not Christ, Popery is not Christianity, superstition and idolatry is not gospel-worship, the mass is not the Lord's supper, prayer in an unknown tongue is not our reasonable service, persecution with fire and sword is none of the means of grace, killing saints is not doing God service, Popish cruelty is not gospel-charity. To be well fixed in these points will increase our zeal against Popery, and help to recover our fame in the Protestant world.

When Papists magnify the church of Rome as Christ's only church, let us think, how can she be a church of Christ, that persecutes his disciples to death, for obeying their Saviour, and cleaving to that doctrine and worship he hath taught them in his word? How can she be a church of Christ, that teacheth doctrines and practices, whereby his glorious name is highly dishonoured and blasphemed; that exalts a poor sinful man unto the titles, dignities, and incommunicable excellencies of the eternal God? How can she be a church of Christ, that robs him of the glory of our salvation, and ascribes it to themselves, by their doctrine of merit; that practises gross idolatry, the abominable thing which he hates; that gives encouragement to sin and wickedness, by human pardons, indulgences, dispensations, &c.; that teaches the necessity of feeding on man's flesh, and drinking of man's blood, in a corporal manner; which barbarous practice of cannibals has been always accounted contrary to the rules of piety and humanity? I shall not again insist upon the monstrous absurdities of this doctrine of theirs, which I showed to be contrary to reason, sense, and the nature of a body, as well as to scripture; but only observe, that a man must offer plain violence to his reason and senses, before he become a Papist; he must believe and practise many things unreasonable, as well as unscriptural. How irrational is it to pray to the dead who cannot hear us, or pray for the dead who cannot be benefited by us, their sentence being irrevocable? Let all these considerations, my dear friends, serve to quicken and maintain your zeal against Popery, in imitation of our pious fathers, and renowned ancestors, now with God. O never desert the Protestant cause, as, alas, many are now doing.

IV. To maintain your abhorrence of the Romish religion, it is proper to bear in mind the treachery and perfidiousness of it. It even teaches the professors of it to be perfidious in their dealings both with God and man. The Pope gives dispensations to Papists to promise any thing to Protestants for deceiving them, providing that in their hearts they stand well affected to Popery. It is a maxim allowed by several Popes and councils, as I showed before, that no faith is to be kept with heretics. And though some Popish princes may be inclined to keep their faith, yet their religion obliges them to break the most solemn leagues and oaths, in order to destroy heretics, when it is in their power; and leaves no hope of salvation to those who refuse to do it, when the Pope requires them. Upon which account, Protestant subjects can nowise trust the promises, written declarations, or oaths of Popish princes, for securing their religion or any thing that is valuable; of which we have many proofs, as in the conduct of queen Mary of England to the men of Suffolk, queen Mary of Scotland to her subjects, king James VII. to his subjects, the promises of the French king to his subjects, which ended in a massacre of them. Pope Martin V. in his letter to Alexander, duke of Lithuania, hath these words, "Know that thou sinnest mortally, if thou keep thy oaths with heretics:" which shows us that Papists must break their oaths, under pain of damnation. Yea, they make the breaking of oaths and leagues not only lawful, but a virtue and necessary duty, where the interest of their church is concerned. Upon these and the like considerations, the wisdom of the British nations has found the inconsistency of a Popish head to a Protestant body; and for the safety of their religion, laws, and liberties, they have made it a fundamental law, that no Papist is capable of succeeding to the imperial crown of these realms. This law being most just and equal, it must surely be laudable in these nations to use the most proper means to maintain it against all the subtle plots and open violence of Rome and her abettors.

V. That you may detest Popery the more, keep up the impressions of the barbarity and cruelty of those who profess it towards Protestants and those who differ from them. Never did Turks or Pagans exercise such merciless fury against Christians as Papists have done. Long hath the mother of harlots been drunk with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus, and loud hath the cry of it been against her, so that the heavy load of this blood will sink her at last as a millstone into the sea, Rev. xviii. 21. I have, in the preceding sermon, spoken something of her bloody cruelty; but, my friends, you can have no right notion of it, unless you read the histories of the French and Bohemian persecutions, and that of the Spanish inquisition, and such books as Clark's Martyrology, which I would think no Christian heart is able to do without abundance of tears. O, the spirit of Popery is not like the spirit of the gospel; it is a religion that vents cruelty, teacheth cruelty, and breathes it every where. Their priests have taught that it is no more sin to kill a heretic, than to kill a dog; that it is not only lawful, but virtuous and heroic, for private persons to kill Protestant princes. It is not enough that they raise wars against Protestants, and kill them in battle; but they justify the murdering of them in cold blood, or in their beds. Not content with doing so in single instances, they choose to massacre them by thousands and tens of thousands in a night, or a hundred thousand in one day. And, though good nature and amiable qualities appear about some Papists, these flow not from their religion, but from the sweetness of their natural disposition. But one thing is certain, that good nature, religion, friendship, gratitude, and every engagement, must give way to the interest of their church, and their doing God service: yea, excommunication and cruelty would be executed against the merciful of that communion, if they did not fall in with the cruel measures concerted against Protestants. Some may say, that Papists have now changed their temper, and dropt their old persecuting spirit. But no credit is due to such suggestions; for the cruel spirit and bloody principles of Papists are just the same as ever : witness the continuing cruelties of the inquisition, their late barbarities to the French Protestants, to the poor Palatines, the Saltzburgers, and many others. Nay, how can it be supposed that Papists will amend of their cruelty ? For, whilst their doctrine of infallibility is believed, the whole principles, decrees, and canons of councils and Popes must be maintained as dictates of the Holy Ghost ; and this among the rest, that it is just, yea meritorious, to cut off those who reject them.

VI. Abhor the idolatry of Rome, as I exhorted before, idolatry is a sin most odious and abominable in the sight of God, as it is most dangerous and damnable to the souls of men. Remember how severely the Jews suffered for it, though their dispensation was far from being so spiritual as yours. With what contempt doth God speak of idols, calling them abominations ? as the abominations of the Ammonites, of the Zidonians, the Moabites, &c. And we may justly speak in the same style of the abominations of the Papists, their idolatry being as detestable as either that of the Jews or heathens was.

VII. Keep up your abhorrence of their proud, self-exalting doctrine of merit ; a most damnable doctrine ! Why ? It draws you back to the covenant of works ; a covenant that curses and condemns you, instead of saving you, seeing it is evident you all sin and come short of the glory of God. Nay, though you did not come short of your duty, but even came fully up to it, you do but what you were bound to do, and so can merit nothing by it. Can a man merit from you, or are you bound to give him an estate, because he paid you a just debt ? Alas, then, what can you merit by your performances, though they were vastly better than they are ! Nay, O man, though you could live without sin, which is impossible, and spend all your time and strength in religious duties, would that satisfy for the breach of the first covenant, or merit heaven ? Though you should give all your estate to the poor, water your couch each night with your tears, and fast your body into a skeleton, yea, live like a holy angel in heaven, the best epitaph you should desire to have on your tomb is, "Here lies an unprofitable servant;" for, seeing you do but your duty, you can pretend to merit nothing from God. Hence it is that God tells us, that what he gives us is all a free gift through Jesus Christ. It is Christ only that merits, not we ; and it is upon Christ's infinite merits alone, that we must rest our sinful souls. Holiness indeed is the way to heaven, but it is Christ that must enter us and lead us in this way, and bring us happily to the end of it. O, what are we, but sinful and unprofitable in ourselves, yet objects of merey in Christ ! And as the worst of our sins are pardonable by Christ, so even the best of our duties are damnable without Christ. Let the holiest man then walk humbly all his days, abhorring himself for sinful defects, and be always willing to be beholden to Christ for all: this is the safe way.

VIII. If you would preserve the gospel and Protestant religion in the land, study to live holy lives answerable to the rules of the gospel. Would you have the truth preserved with you, and you preserved in the truth, then you must love and practise the truth, and hate all sin and ungodliness opposite thereto. What signifies the profession of Protestantism, and the enjoyment of pure doctrine and worship, if these produce no change of heart or life, which is the end of all religion ? What signifies your reforming from the errors, idolatries, and superstitions of Rome, if you do not reform from the worldliness, wickedness, and profanity that reign in the world ? For what is the design of the gospel or the doctrine of grace, which the Reformation brings you, but to teach you "to deny all ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world ; looking for the blessed hope, and glorious appearing of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ?" Tit. ii. 12, 13. Now, if this end be not answered, the design of our reformation from Popery is not obtained. The design of it was to reform your lives as well as your heads, your practices as well as your principles. A drunken Protestant, a whoring, a swearing Protestant, an impenitent, unbelieving, or worldly Protestant, shall not be saved from God's wrath more than an idolatrous Papist. Though you do not bow to images and Popish idols, yet you are liable to wrath, if you make an idol of your money, or love the world too much. Though you profess to own Christ as the only King and Head of his church, and renounce the Pope as head of it ; yet if you do not believe on Christ, choose him for your King and Head, and love him above all, you are still within the flood-mark of God's wrath. Do not think that the name or profession of Protestants will save you, or that God will preserve the gospel with you, if your lives be not such as becomes the gospel. Alas, that some Protestant nations should be so like to Popish nations in their language and practices ! O ! cursing, damning, and swearing Protestants, will no more escape wrath than blasphemous idolatrous Papists.

IX. Guard against the snares and stratagems of those who are agents and factors for Rome, and those who under sundry disguises and fair colours are paving the way for the return of Popery, as by introducing new usages into the church, or rather old errors and superstitions which our zealous Reformers cast out and abjured.

Beware of the arguments of those who plead for the setting up of Popish princes and rulers over us, the immediate forerunners of Popery. When they plead for a man's hereditary right to govern as indefeasible, believe them not; seeing there is nothing in scripture for it; but on the contrary there are frequent instances of God's passing by the eldest in families, and choosing the younger to govern. Neither is there any thing in reason for a man's right to possess a nation or millions of men as his property, which he may dispose of as absolutely as of his cattle; and that he cannot forfeit this right by the worst usage of them; and that this right should descend from him to his heirs as their natural inheritance, unalienable upon any account whatsoever. It would be a wicked arranging of the goodness of God, the merciful Parent of mankind, to say he gives a man an absolute right to dispose of his fellow-creatures at his pleasure, and hath left no lawful remedy in their hands against the most cruel and oppressive tyranny. This were in effect to make God himself the patron of lawless tyranny and oppression. But, let tyrants and their abettors talk as they will, it is evident, that mankind have a natural right to secure and preserve their valuable interests, civil and religious; and also that particular nations have a right to secure to themselves true bible-religion, together with their lives and properties, against the lawless and barbarous attacks of idolatry, tyranny, and oppression. If such Romish agents use flattering speeches and fair promises to gain their design, believe them not; for their religion binds them to extirpate heretics. If they use threatenings to bring you into sinful compliances with them, yield not upon any account to support antichrist, but keep your garments clean in the hour of temptation. Lose what you will, lose not the peace and purity of conscience, or the smiles of a reconciled God in Christ.

X. In this time of common danger, let all true Protestants drop their intestine jars, and unite their counsels, strength, and prayers against the violent designs of antichrist against them and their holy religion. Let us all with one heart and mouth pray that Romish darkness and idolatry may never overspread these lands. Now the devil and his angels, the Pope and his conclave, the French and Spaniards, together with Papists and malignants at home, are all at this time combining to overturn our Protestant establishment; wherefore cry fervently, that God may interpose and defeat their counsels and attempts, as he hath frequently done before. Pray for the continuance of the preaching of Christ, and of the gospel-way of justification through his imputed righteousness, in opposition to the doctrine of merit. Pray for the continuance of a pure spiritual way of worshipping God, in opposition to a carnal idolatrous worship that amuses the outward senses. Pray for your prosperity, that the bible, and its truths and worship, may still remain with them. Should Popery prevail, what a dismal prospect must we have of the young and rising generations! How soon would they be taught to worship images, pray to saints, and practise the superstitions of Rome! O! should not this consideration awaken your zeal against Popery, and excite you to use all proper means to oppose it?

Likewise pity and pray for illumination to those who are blinded with the delusions of antichrist, being carried away to dumb idols even as they are led, and taught to give blind obedience to their leaders, without looking to what God saith to them in his word. Pray that God may open the eyes of those who think they do God service by killing Protestants, or those who cannot fall in with Popish inventions, in opposition to divine institutions. And lastly, strive in such an evil day as this, to get into the strong hold of Christ's wounds, and under the covert of his blood; for there is no safety in the day of wrath but here.

A FAIR AND IMPARTIAL TESTIMONY.

PREFACE.

THOUGH I be far less fit for framing a Testimony to the principles, wrestlings, and attainments of this church, and against the corruptions, defections, and evils of the times, than many of my brethren; yet, being encouraged by some whom I highly value to undertake it, and finding none else inclined to it, I have essayed it through divine strength, hoping to see a "witnessing body" appear within this church, as well as without it, at least some who would desire to testify against the evils of the day with just zeal, impartiality, and meekness.

No sooner set I my face to it, but I saw it to be a matter of great difficulty to steer a straight course, without swerving to the right or left hand, in these reeling and shaking times, when such different opinions are vented, provocations are given, calumnies are spread, and men's passions are stirred on each side, so that even the meekest and wisest are ready to stagger: I found also the difficulty increase, from the divided sentiment of godly ministers with respect to some particular occurrences, and the strong inclination of many to live at ease, enjoy quiet, and even to sit down, Issachar-like, and couch under the burden, when hopes of relief do not appear. These things greatly discouraged me to proceed in the design.

But when I duly weighed and considered the growing dangers of the church, the backsliding disposition that still prevailed, and the unsuccessfulness of all other methods to recover her from it, such as "dissents, protests, instructions, representations, petitions, separations, secessions," &c. and that the only mean now left to be tried for giving check to corruption, and exciting reformation, seemed to be that of an honest Testimony of some within the church: I determined at length to go on through all difficulties and discouragements, to prepare and publish the following essay, with a sincere intention to preserve the mother-church, and promote her interests;

looking to heaven for a blessing on it, that it may be of use to excite judicatories to put a stop to some evils, and reform some things amiss: and though it should have little effect on the present backsliding age, yet hoping it may be useful to the rising generation, when God shall send a general revival of true Christianity in the land; at such a time the subscribers of this Testimony will continue, when dead, thus to speak, to the glory of the ever-living Redeemer.

I considered also, within myself, that our old suffering ministers were all gone off the stage, and many other worthy brethren were going off from time to time, and that I myself got frequent warnings to prepare for going: and at the same time, that numbers of eminent good men drop into the silent grave, without leaving any testimony behind them; so that in a short time it may be called in question what their mind was concerning the principles and attainments of our fathers, and the corruptions of present and former times; and, if I continued to linger a little longer, this would be my own fate also. Wherefore I resolved to expose this essay, and myself likewise, to the censure of the world; and though I should be charged with mean and selfish views in it, as affecting singularity, a name, applause from some, &c. if the Lord call me to bear reproach in carrying on a good design, why should I not submit to it? Surely it may be thought that one of my age should be dead to these vanities, and that it is high time for me to be seeking the approbation of my great Judge, more than that of all the world. May I ever mind this!

Quest. It is like it may be asked, What warrant have you for emitting such a Testimony?

Ans. The reasons and grounds of it seem so plain both from scripture and sound reason, that we may adventure to submit them to all thinking persons to judge of them.

I. The servants of God, and especially ministers of the gospel, are frequently in scripture called his witnesses; in regard they are called to give testimony to his truths and ways, and to bear witness against what is prejudicial or contrary thereto; Rev. xi. 3, 7; Luke xxiv. 48; John v. 33; xv. 27; Acts i. 8; xxii. 15, 18; xxvi. 19. It is by such witness-bearing that we must hold fast the truths of God when ready to be plucked from us, and to contend for the faith which he hath delivered to his saints; Rev. iii. 11; Jude ver. 3. And in this way we are to wrestle with, and overcome truth's adversaries; Rev. xii. 11, "They overcame by the blood of the Lamb, and the word of their testimony." The character which God gives his servants three times in the compass of a few verses, should make a very deep impression upon us; Isa. xliii. 10, 12; xlv. 8, "Ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord." And it is in that capacity he calls and requires us to "confess Christ before men," to "bear witness to Christ and to his truths," to "stand fast in the faith," to "quit ourselves like men," to "be strong," to "be steadfast," to "be zealous and valiant for the truth," to "be faithful unto death," to "contend earnestly for the faith, and set ourselves for the defence of the gospel," to "plead with our mother," to "keep the charge of the Lord, and the charge of his sanctuary," to "keep that which is committed to our trust," to "be clean who bear the vessels of the Lord, and not to touch the unclean thing," to "save ourselves from an untoward generation," to "keep our garments clean and unspotted from the world," to "hate the work of them that turn aside, that it may not cleave to us," to "keep ourselves pure, and not to be partakers of other men's sins," to "flee from sin, and deliver every man his own soul," to "abhor what is evil," to "cleave unto the Lord, and to that which is good," to "keep ourselves from the accursed thing," to "be watchmen to the house of Israel, and give them warning from God," to "cry aloud and not spare," to "show the house of Jacob their sins," to "reprove the works of darkness; not to suffer sin upon our brother," to "be pure from the blood of all men, and not to shun to declare all the counsel of God." Now these multiplied Scripture texts and divine precepts afford us clear and plain warrant to make an open appearance and declaration for our Lord Jesus Christ, and for his truths and ways when injured; and against the evils and corruptions of the times, especially when they are avowed and infectious, and like to infect more and more.

II. Writing and leaving a testimony behind us to true religion, and against error and corruption, is necessary and useful for the instruction, conviction, and confirmation, both of the present and future generations, and a very proper mean for handing down God's truths and institutions pure from age to age; which is a debt that one generation owes to another, as God declares in his word; Psal. lxxviii. 5—7, "He established a testimony in Jacob, and appointed a law in Israel, which he commanded our fathers that they should make them known to their children; that the generation to come might know them, even the children which should be born, who should arise and declare them to their children: That they might set their hope in God, and not forget the works of God, but keep his commandments." Psal. cxlv. 4, "One generation shall praise thy works to another, and shall declare thy mighty acts," and according to Psal. cii. 18, God's works of grace and mercy are to be "written for the generations to come, that the people which are to be created may praise the Lord." And we are enjoined, Psal. xlviii. 13, to "walk about Zion, to tell her towers, mark her bulwarks and palaces," viz., the institutions and ornaments of the gospel-church, "that we may show them to the generation following." And we are appointed, Ezek. xliii. 11, to "show to the house of Israel the form and fashion of the house of God, with the ordinances and laws thereof, and to write it in their sight, that they may keep them and do them." All these plainly demonstrate our scripture warrant for leaving such written testimonies behind us.

III. Writing and emitting faithful Testimonies for God and his ways, is necessary and seasonable, especially in times of corruption and backsliding, even when true religion is in danger. In such times, Christ kindly accepts and rewards our open "confessing of him" and his truths before men; Rev. ii. 2; Mat. x. 32. And, on the other hand, he severely threatens our conniving at error and impiety, and not bearing testimony against them when they abound; Rev. ii. 14—16. Now, is not the backsliding day in which we live a proper season for such open confessions and faithful testimonies, when errors of all kinds are tolerated, approved truths are run down, and manifold corruptions prevail, to the dishonour of God and our holy religion; and when applications to judicatories for redress are unsuccessful? Surely it must be in such a time as this, that God calls his servants and witnesses to "rise up for him," by faithful testimonies, "against the evil-doers, and stand up for him against the workers of iniquity," Psal. xciv. 16.

Object. Some perhaps will say, The corruptions and grievances of the times are not so great as some are ready to make them.

Ans. No doubt some aggravate them beyond what is true and just. But if what those say be fact, who use to speak within bounds, viz. 1. That a spirit of infidelity and error greatly prevails in the land, and open attacks are made upon the holy scriptures and the Christian religion. 2. That a free toleration is given to all kinds of error, Arminian, Socinian, Arian, Popish, Deistical, &c. which are spreading more and more. 3. That sundry of the clergy are suspected of, and charged more than formerly, not only with looseness and immoralities in their lives, but also with laxness and unsoundness in their principles; and some of these are allowed to possess eminent posts in colleges, and even to teach divinity, and train up young men for the holy ministry. 4. That many of these have no regard to act 7th, Assembly 1736, with respect to evangelical preaching, but take up with legal doctrine, and a sort of a heathenish morality, instead of preaching Christ to sinners, which ought to be the main business of every gospel minister. 5. That many of them give great encouragement to patronage, that woful usurpation over the church of God, when they are under no necessity from the law to do it. 6. That gross intrusions are continued upon Christian congregations, who are thereby spoiled of their right to call their own pastors, contrary to the word of God and our known principles. 7. That there are now most unreasonable divisions, ill grounded and unscriptural separations, among sound and godly Presbyterians; contrary to Christ's royal law of love, and precepts of "keeping the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." 8. That there are strange liberties taken by many, of whom better things might have been expected, in reproaching the work of God's Holy Spirit, in awakening, convincing, and bringing lost sinners home to himself. 9. That the Episcopal clergy are forsaking the Protestant cause, taking up old Popish errors and superstitions which their fathers cast out, and sliding gradually back again to Rome. Now, if these things be true, as many allege with too much ground, Christ's witnesses have a plain call from him to stand up against these defections by faithful testimonies, and to give free warning of the evil and danger of them before it be too late.

IV. A written subscribed testimony seems necessary in obedience to the ninth Commandment, for preserving and clearing the names and characters of honest ministers and elders, in times of defection, and for vindicating them from the common charge of the corruptions and wrong steps of the societies whercof they are members. As they are often loaded unjustly with these evils, so their giving a subscribed testimony against them is a proper way to wipe off aspersions from their names while they live, to prevent blackening of their memories when dead, and also to yield them much inward peace when dying. Wherefore, in my humble opinion, the call seems to be pretty clear to them who desire to "keep their garments unspotted, and to hate the work of them that turn aside, that it may not cleave to them," and who would embalm their names to posterity as witnesses for God in an evil time, to declare their minds, by joining in such a Testimony as this, and thereby exonerate their consciences with respect to the backsliding and defections under which they have been long groaning. And whatsoever their hand finds to do in this matter, it is fit they do it without loss of time, seeing their standing is so slippery every day upon the brink of the grave.

V. Emitting testimonies in time of defection hath been the approved practice of God's worthies in former times. They judged their giving written testimonies against growing errors and corruptions, to be the lifting up a banner for truth, and the proper means to stop the current of defection, and to excite and plead with their mother to use her best endeavours for that effect. We have still extant such faithful testimonies given by sundry ministers in the years 1658 and 1659, when a toleration was granted by law to the sectaries and errors which then prevailed: namely, that famous testimony drawn up against these errors, and to the doctrine, the worship, discipline, and government of this church, subscribed by Mr. Samuel Rutherford, Mr. James Wedderburn, Mr. James Guthrie, Mr. Alexander Moncrieff, Mr. Thomas Lundie, and many others. Likewise a testimony against toleration by the presbytery of Edinburgh, 5th October, 1659. One by the ministers of Lancashire, 3d March, 1648. One by Mr. George Gillespie, two days before his death. One by the ministers of London, 14th December, 1647. One by Mr. Rutherford, on his death-bed, February, 1661. One by Dr. Horneck, against stage plays, &c. And, lastly, what are all the dying speeches which our martyrs have left written behind them, but so many testimonies to the truths and ways of God, and against the errors and corruptions of their times? And these testimonies, however much despised by the world, God hath blessed as means for continuing truth and gospel-purity among us to this day. And who knows but the Testimony now essayed, in imitation of the fore-said worthies, may likewise be of use for preserving truth, and exciting reformation, when many of the present backsliding generation are laid in the dust? A new turn of affairs, and general revival, may yet come: the Lord himself hasten it! Now it will be highly useful at such a time, for the generation to know something of the sentiments and practices of ancient wrestlers against corruption. Were there no testimonies of this kind, both the knowledge of truth, and the sense of duty and of sin, in sundry cases, would be lost to the rising ages, towards whom we of the present age are indispensably bound to act a kind and faithful part, viz., to give them just information.

Object. It may be alleged, "That the dissents and contentings of honest ministers, recorded in the books of synods and presbyteries, and other judicatories are sufficient to inform after ages."

Ans. These testimonies are commonly dormant in church-records, and are little known in the world: and frequently these registers are quite lost, by their going from hand to hand, or by the death of their keepers; which indeed is a very great loss to after ages. Were all the testimonies of ministers and judicatories, relating to patronage and accepting of presentations, published, they might be of very great use; and particularly the acts of synods thereanent, mentioned p. 54. of the Testimony. The synods of Aberdeen, Ross, Angus, Perth, Fife, &c., made acts of that kind, severals of which I have seen, which well deserve to be published. The substance of them being comprehended in the act of the synod of Fife, I shall insert it here.

"At Cupar, April 2d, 1735. The synod of Fife taking into their serious consideration, that patronages, with power of presenting men to take the oversight of souls, is a manifest encroachment upon the rights and liberties of the church of Christ, which the judicatories and faithful members of this church from its reformation have always complained of, and struggled against, as what deprives Christian congregations of that interest they ought to have in calling their own pastors, and which is claimed and asserted by the assemblies of this church: and further considering, that some accept of presentations before any call from the vacant congregations, and without the advice and consent of the presbytery of the bounds, and sometimes even before the parishioners have occasion to hear them, or show their inclinations to them; and adhere to their presentations, notwithstanding the aversion of the congregations, and thereby give great offence, in showing so little regard to the weighty ends of a gospel ministry, the glory of the great and chief Shepherd, and the edification of his flock, and in affording too much occasion to people to look on them as seeking more a living to themselves than to serve the Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore the synod of Fife do hereby give warning to all ministers and preachers of the gospel within their bounds, of the evil and danger of such undue acceptance of presentations; earnestly exhorting and admonishing to beware thereof, as they would not mar the edification of Christ's flock, and continue this heavy grievance upon this church, and expose themselves to the just censure of its judicatories. And, to the intent this admonition may be the more regarded the synod appoints a copy thereof to be recorded in all the presbytery books within their bounds; and that the presbyteries, at their first meeting after the minutes of the synod come to their hands, cause read the same judicially, and also give copies thereof to all the ministers and preachers within their bounds, and likewise such students of divinity as may be presently under their trials, or hereafter may be taken on trials by them; and that hereafter, before they enter any upon trials, either for preaching the gospel, or for the holy ministry, they endeavour to understand their sentiments anent presentations being a grievance to this church, and their resolution to observe the recommendation of this act." But it must be told, with deep regret, that these acts of synods, not being supported by superior judicatories, came soon to be disregarded, and so the door of patronage is still kept open, whereby a corrupt ministry enters into the church: may the Lord in mercy shut that door! Alas, how sad and mournful a thing is it, that ministers and preachers have no pity upon this once famous church, which is already defaced, and corrupted, and likely to be corrupted more and more, by patronage and presentations; when it is plainly in their power to deliver their mother-church from this woful corruption and bondage! O what hard and cruel hearts must many ministers and preachers now have!

There is one thing to be lamented, which tends to bring in a set of clergy, who have no scruple to encourage patronage, intrusions, error, and looseness: namely, the planting of our universities with masters who are either suspected as to their principles or morals, or who have little zeal for orthodoxy or piety. When such men are appointed to be heads of colleges, professors of sciences, languages, or divinity, for training up of young men for the ministry; what is to be expected from the students under their care, but that many of them will be leavened with bad principles and inclinations? And how can better masters in colleges or professors of divinity be looked for, while these are chosen by statesmen, magistrates, or regents, several of whom have no real concern for Christianity, but may even be tinctured with error or infidelity? Alas! whilst matters stand thus with us, if private measures be not taken by friends of the church to get sound and pious men to teach divinity, besides those in colleges, this church may soon be overrun with corruption, looseness, and error of all sorts; which I pray the Lord in mercy to prevent.

Some may object, "Why do you insist so much against patronage, seeing this was in the church in former times of presbytery, and now accepting of presentations is become common and fashionable, and the judicatories connive at it?"

Ans. 1. Our circumstances now differ vastly from theirs in former times. Why? In former times the law laid them under a necessity of entering to churches by the patron's leave, there being no other way of entry; but now we are under no such necessity, there being a gospel-door still left open to us. In former times they were never delivered from patronage, nor sensible of the happiness of freedom from it: but we have been set at liberty, and know the happiness of it. They did not voluntarily submit to patronage after they were freed from it; but this, alas, is what we are doing: we have chosen this bondage, and subjected ourselves to it, without any necessity from the law; so that our compliers with patronage are far more inexcusable than those in former times: our misery now is undeniably from ourselves, we are plainly self-destroyers. O that our help may come from God in Christ, who even pits them who destroy themselves!

2. However common the accepting of presentations be at this time, the acceptor's sin is not lessened thereby, nor is he the safer from the wrath of God. A just God hath common punishments for common sinners: witness the flood that he brought upon a world of sinners at once. The acceptor makes himself directly a partner with the patron in his sinful usurpation over the church of God, and becomes in some respects more guilty than he; as is evident from the Testimony, p. 51, 52. Now, if this practice be sinful, as certainly it is, the commonness of it will not at all loose us from obedience to God's command, that enjoins us to "hate and abhor that which is evil," and as God's witnesses to bear our testimony against it. Surely the commonness of this evil is one ground of the Lord's controversy with this church and land, for which we ought to fast and mourn.

3. As to the church's conniving at these acceptances, I heartily bewail it: alas! the fear of men hath brought them into this snare, as is observed in the Testimony, p. 51. But, whatever be the temptation, the word of God holds it as a sin in any church to bear with those who are evil, or do evil, without duly testifying against the evil, yea, and censuring those who are impenitent and obstinate in an evil course. Wherefore I am afraid that our keeping silence so much at this sinful connivance, may come to involve us into the guilt of it. O what need have we to be humbled under a sense of this and other shortcomings, and to cry with the psalmist, "Who can understand his errors? Cleanse thou me from secret faults." May the Lord bring the whole church, and every member of it, to a sense of what is sin, and what is duty, in this matter! As for my part, I must declare my opinion, That all those who are erroneous, immoral, intruders, supporters of patronage, and spoilers of Christian congregations of the rights which Christ hath purchased for them, ought to be testified against, and dealt with to bring them to repentance; and, if they remain impenitent and obstinate, they ought to be purged out of the church. And if they still be connived at in the church, notwithstanding of impenitence, I cannot but look on the society as dangerous, infectious, and hurtful. Likewise I must own, that the word of God makes it the duty of those who would keep their garments clean, to mark them, avoid them, and turn away from them, at least as to intimate fellowship and familiarity; for, if we should continue familiar with them, we will be ready to lose that abhorrence of their evil courses which God commands, and also to encourage and harden them in them. Wherefore it seems needful for those who would keep conscience pure while attending judicatories where such members are, that they protest or declare that their presence with them ought not to be constructed as giving any sort of countenance or encouragement to their evil courses, but rather as designed to testify against them, stop and prevent them, and to excite and promote reformation as much as in their power.

I make no question but sundry will be offended with this plain dealing, and especially those who would fain be "at ease in Zion," though in a time of grievous provocations and backslidings, and of the Lord's judgments both inflicted and impending; but, if I know my own heart, it is truly conscience, not humour—love to the church, not hatred, that prompted me to this plainness. I see no way to put an end to the Lord's controversy with us, but by a sincere turning to God in Christ, in the way of faith, repentance, and reformation. Now, if we would behave as true penitents, and make peace with an offended God, we must fall in with the revealed will of God in every thing: we must be so far from pleading for sin, bearing with, or conniving at it; that we must forsake sin, yea, hate and abhor what is evil, reprove the works of darkness, and have no fellowship with them. This being the express will of God to us, how can we think he will be at peace with us, until we sincerely fall in with it! I acknowledge it is not easy to keep up the impressions of sin's evil, and a due abhorrence of it, when sin turns common and fashionable; it is not easy to keep clean garments, when the examples of sin are always before our eyes, and especially when we see those who are reputed pious drawn into it: but these things should weigh but little with us, when we see it is the express will of God, that they "who bear the vessels of the Lord must be clean, must keep themselves pure," and not so much as "touch the unclean thing;" and those who would take the kingdom, must do violence to their carnal ease and interest, when they interfere with the will and glory of God. These considerations have moved me to use this plainness, and to join in the following Testimony against sin; and that not only to keep myself pure, but also to preserve others, if possible, from the prevailing sins and evils of the day, which are more infectious and dangerous than any plague whatsoever: and this I think is the greatest act of charity that can be done to the precious souls of men.

The common objection against emitting this or the like Testimony is, "That it may have bad consequences, make new divisions and distinctions in the church, give advantage to her adversaries," &c.

Ans. 1. The subscribers of this Testimony testify against the ill-grounded divisions and unscriptural separations among Presbyterians which now prevail; and they design not to alter their respects or conduct towards other godly ministers, who may not be clear about every thing contained in this Testimony, seeing they never intended it as the badge of a party, or a term of communion either ministerial or Christian, but only to be an exoneration to conscience, a witness against corruption, and a prompter to reformation.

2. This argument, taken from the fear of division, strikes equally against all testimonies whatsoever, against those emitted by our ancient worthies in times of defection, against the representation of the forty-two ministers in the year 1732, and against all dissents and protestations in judicatories: for it may be pretended, that those testimonies or public appearances tend also to make divisions in the church: nay, the same argument may be made use of against our giving a Testimony against Prelaey, or the English service, or any gross error, were they coming into the church.

3. We must not neglect present duty for the fear of bad consequences which possibly may never happen; especially when we evidently see that the neglect will have far worse consequences. In my view, by our omitting to give a Testimony against error and corruption, when it is called for, and all to prevent the evil of division which is uncertain; we bring on evils far greater and more certain, viz., "the loss of truth and purity, and the sinful neglect of duty," both to God and the generations present and to come. We see that great man, Luther, reckoned the loss of any of God's truths to be the greatest of evils; Ruat cælum (said he) potius quam una mica veritatis pereat. And holy David says, Psal. cxix. 72, "the law of thy mouth is better to me than thousands of gold and silver."

4. We ought to observe the order laid down in that divine precept, Ezek. viii. 19, "Love the truth and peace;" where the Spirit of God gives truth to the precedence of peace. Peace indeed is a thing very lovely in itself, but truth is far more amiable and precious, and must never be sacrificed to preserve peace. Union or peace is no real blessing to a church if she be in a state of lukewarmness, or sliding back into corruption or error. Peace, in such a state, is rather a judgment than a mercy.

5. A most lamentable division and schism broke in amongst us a few years ago, when no Testimony was in the field. Nay, in all probability, if a free and faithful Testimony had been essayed by a great body of ministers some time before it happened, instead of making a schism, it had prevented one, and might also have stopt judicatories from going such lengths as they have done.

6. As to adversaries getting advantage of this Testimony, the subscribers, as they had no such view, so they expect no such event, but rather the contrary, viz., that they will lose by it. But, whatever happen, if truth and holiness get any advantage by it, as is honestly designed, that gain will countervail any other damage.

But it is in vain to multiply answers to some, who will by no arguments be reconciled to a fair and honest Testimony to truth, when the stream of opposition is strong against it. I now see, by the discouragements I have met with in this attempt, that those who will be faithful to the truth, must be valiant for it also, and not daunted by the fear or faces, power or numbers of those who oppose it, or who shift appearing for it. It is one of the characters of God's servants, which he takes pleasure in, to be valiant for the truth upon the earth, especially when it is run down; Jer. ix. 3. And indeed it is sometimes run down with such violence, that there is no lifting up a Testimony for it, without something of this Christian valour. It is truly afflicting to me, to find that there are so many of my brethren whom I love and esteem, who privately own they are of the same mind with the following Testimony, concerning the defections and corruptions of the times, and yet have not the resolution to declare this under their hand to the world. I would be very loth to say they are of those whom the scriptures call the fearful, because of the society I see them classed with, Rev. xxi. 8. But I have freedom to say, that the present dangerous state of this church, of the truths of God, and true Christianity, in this day of backsliding, is such, as requires more courage and resolution for preserving true religion, and reviving a work of reformation, than what the most part of good men appear at this time to be possessed of. May the Lord himself raise up and qualify men for his own work!

As I join with the Testimony in other things, so especially in the humble pleadings with our mother, with which it concludes; entreating that she would call all ranks to lay to heart the sins abounding, and the judgments impending, and to set about extraordinary fasting, humiliation, prayer, repentance, and reformation. The present dangerous situation these nations are in from the combination of cruel Popish adversaries, who have destroyed other Protestant churches, and multitudes of their fellow-creatures, loudly call upon us to these duties. Very lately we were like to have been surprised with a formidable invasion from France, when unprovided for it; but the Lord of hosts, in his astonishing mercy, pitied our naked, defenceless condition, stepped in himself, and fought for us; he caused his winds and stormy seas to oppose the enemy, and dash many of them in pieces, and so broke the attempt for that time: surely our deliverance about the end of February last, 1744, by God's own immediate hand, together with others of the same kind, should not be forgot by us. But though he hath thereby allowed us a further breathing time and space to repent, our danger is not over: for now France, as well as Spain, has declared war against us. Now the "kings of the earth set themselves, and the princes take counsel together, against the Lord," and these Protestant nations. Now there is a more formidable conjunction of Popish powers against us than ever we saw before. Now France, Spain, Rome, Naples, Sicily, &c., these cruel and bloody nations, seem all to be combined against our Protestant king, and his royal family, whom God long preserve, seeking and plotting how to destroy them, together with our religion, laws, and liberties; and, instead thereof, to set up among us a Popish pretender, an arbitrary government, and a blasphemous, idolatrous, and bloody religion. And may not the numerous hosts of these nations, and the cruelty of a Popish party, wherever they get the upper hand of Protestants, as manifested in the dreadful burnings in queen Mary's reign, the inquisition in Spain and Italy, the massacre in Ireland, in Paris, and other towns of France; I say, may not these alarm us, and sufficiently convince us of our danger, if the Lord permit them, for our sins, to plot and effectuate a new invasion upon us? These days wherein we live, are surely perilous times upon sundry accounts, and call us not only to join in fervent prayer to God for mercy and help for Christ's sake, and to be deeply humbled for, and to mourn over, the procuring causes of God's wrath; but also to bear free and open Testimony against those evils which are the Achans in our camp, and Jonahs under deck, that raise such terrible storms against this poor church and land. It cannot but make deep impression, when sometimes we call to mind the fore-thoughts and predictions of several of God's worthies in this land, from scaffolds, and also from the pulpit and press, that "God would at length proceed to terrible judgments, in resentment of his controversy with covenant-breaking Scotland, before the return of his wonted glory and presence in the sanctuary; yea, that our land should be made to swim with blood for the blood of God's saints that hath been shed therein." Now, the oftener that God delivers us from Popish enemies, and the longer we unthankfully abuse and misimprove God's mercies and deliverances, our guilt and danger still become the greater. As the cup of our iniquity fills up, so doth the cup of God's wrath proportionably.

Ought not then these awful dispensations to move and quicken us to act a faithful part, both for God's glory and our own safety, even to pray, dissent, declare, and testify against these evils which we cannot stop? Were we helped to do this sincerely, we might hope, through our Redeemer's mediation, that they would not be charged upon us in the day of count and reckoning, and that we should even be hid in the day of the Lord's anger. For we find the angel of the covenant holds the winds, until the servants of the living God be sealed for preservation in a time of danger: nay, an upright witnessing remnant might, through divine mercy, be the happy means of preserving the whole land from the invasion of cruel and bloody enemies, and of getting the poor decayed church of Scotland interested in that promise; Jer. xxx. 11, "I am with thee, to save thee: and though I make a full end of all nations about thee, yet will I not make a full end of thee; but I will correct thee in measure, and not leave thee altogether unpunished." May the Lord himself direct ministers and others to proper measures for turning away the fierceness of God's anger from us; and open the eyes of men to discern the true grounds and causes of God's controversy with the land! And if it should please the Lord to bless the following Testimony for promoting these ends in any measure, yea, though it were but to convince one minister or preacher of the evil of intrusions, of supporting patronage, and of the neglect of preaching Christ, it would contribute to support me under all the discouragements I have met with in making the essay to lift up a Testimony against these evils. That the mighty Lord, who can accomplish great things by small means, may succeed this honest design, is the prayer of

JOHN WILLISON.

A FAIR AND IMPARTIAL TESTIMONY.

ESSAYED IN NAME OF A NUMBER OF MINISTERS, ELDERS, AND CHRISTIAN PEOPLE OF THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND, ETC.

ACCORDING to ancient historians, our gracious God was pleased to visit Scotland very early with his glorious gospel, by means of some preachers and other Christians, who were forced to flee to Scotland to be out of the reach of Roman cruelty, under the second persecution raised by the emperor Domitian, about the year of our Lord 95, which was before the death of the apostle John; where they propagated the knowledge of Jesus Christ, which at length conquered Pagan darkness and idolatry so far, that, in the beginning of the third century, about the year 203, king Donald I. publicly confessed the faith of Jesus Christ; and he himself, his queen, his family, and divers of the nobles, were solemnly baptized. After which, the king used his best endeavours to root out idolatry and heathenish superstition from his dominions, and to settle a gospel-ministry in every corner thereof.

But this religious king being much hindered in his good designs by his continual wars with the Romans, under the emperor Severus, this blessed work was afterwards greatly neglected by following princes until the reign of king Crathilinth, who, about the year 277, set about the glorious work of advancing Christianity, after the example of king Donald the first Christian king, but was greatly hindered by the heathenish priests named Druids, called so, as some think, because of their sacrificing in groves under oaks. These idolatrous priests had got their interest and credit among the people, by reason of their sense-pleasing worship, and of their having drawn into their hands the determining of civil affairs; wherefore the people reckoned them so necessary, that they knew not how to live without them. But the Lord in mercy seconded the intentions of the good king, by several worthy men, both ministers and private Christians, from the south parts of Britain, and other parts of the Roman empire, who were obliged to flee in the time of the ninth persecution, under Aurelius, and of the tenth, under Dioclesian, from the terrible slaughter then made among the Christians. And these retiring to Scotland for refuge, as others had done long before them, were very helpful in turning the people from idolatry.

King Crathilinth finding among these refugees many men of eminent piety and learning, kindly entertained them, and employed them in opposing the Druids, and further settling of Christianity through his kingdom. These holy men being settled in several places of the land, and choosing retirement from all civil and worldly affairs, and giving up themselves wholly to the service of God in the ministerial work, were called Culdees, or Cultores Dei. These Culdees, through the divine blessing, got the better of the Druids, and were great instruments of advancing true piety and Christianity in Scotland; so that "from these uttermost parts of the earth were songs heard, even glory to Jesus Christ the righteous;" and thus were accomplished in part the ancient promises made to our Redeemer, that "the heathen should be given to him as his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession; that the isles should wait for his law, and their kings bring presents to him: that he should be the confidence of the ends of the earth, and of them that are afar upon the sea."

These blessed instruments, the Culdees, were strict in their lives, and in governing the church of Christ. They allowed no higher order among them than presbyteries or parochial bishops, and so continued for many years, until Palladius was sent thither by Pope Celestine, about the year 425, who, by his subtle insinuations, gained so far upon the simple people, as to bring them to consent to a change of the government of the church into prelacy, and he himself became the chief prelate among them. Both the historians of our own and other nations, such as Fordun, Boethius, John Major, Buchanan, Sir Thomas Craig, Prosper, Baronius, Beda, Baleus, &c., all agree that the Scots for several hundred years after Christ were taught and governed by priests and monks without bishops, and that Palladius was the first bishop or prelate that ever Scotland saw. John of Fordun, in his Scots Chronicles, lib. 3. cap. 8, saith, "Before the incoming of Palladius, the Scots had for teachers of the faith, and ministers of the sacraments, presbyters only, or monks, following the rites and customs of the primitive church." And who questioned but the Scots were as sincere Christians, their ministers as real ministers, and their sacraments as true sacraments, all these 400 years, as they were in after ages? Yea, Baleus, in his history of the Britains, cent. 14. cap. 5, saith more, Ante Palladium Scoti, &c., "Before Palladius came, the Scots had their bishops and ministers, according to the ministry of the word of God, chosen by the suffrage of the people, after the custom of those of Asia; but these things did not please the Romans, who hated the Asiatics." So that we see the ancient Scots maintained presbytery, without either prelacy or patronage, till the Romans or church of Rome introduced both. And surely the Scots have still good reason to be zealous for their ancient church government and privileges, which they long enjoyed, in opposition to the Roman corruptions.

But Palladius having got our government changed, and our acquaintance made with Rome, then the mistress of the world, the church fell into a decaying condition, and Popish corruptions increased more and more, till at length gross darkness overspread this whole land, as well as other nations; under which she lay for many ages, for what we read, until the year 1494, in the reign of king James IV. when the Lollards of Kyle, to the number of thirty persons, were summoned before the king and his council, for holding many of the Protestant articles of faith, though they were dismissed at that time. So that God had his witnesses in Scotland, who bore Testimony to his truths, against the errors and idolatries of Rome, even in the darkest times.

Not many years after, that eminent man, Mr. Patrick Hamilton, abbot of Fern, went abroad to the university of Wittenberg, where he became acquainted with Luther and Melancthon, and made great progress in learning and knowledge of Christ; and, being filled with zeal to propagate the same in his native country, he returned, and openly inveighed against the Romish errors and corruptions, upon which account he was burnt at St. Andrews, in the year 1527. This by the wisdom of God, tended much to the spreading of the truth: for many inquiring into the cause of this burning, came afterwards to the knowledge and profession of the truth; so that it spread more and more through the land, in spite of all that enemies could do against it. Likewise Paul Craw was condemned to be burnt at St. Andrews, in the year 1431, for maintaining the doctrine of John Wickliff and John Huss.

It is most remarkable, that after the burning of Mr. Hamilton, the favourers of the truth increased to many thousands; and God was pleased to raise up other famous instruments for spreading the light, and carrying on his work; such as Messrs. George Wishart, John Rough, John Knox, John Willock, Mr. Craig, John Erskine of Dun, and many others. These polished shafts God was pleased so to endow and furnish with gifts, graces, and zeal for God and his truths, and some of them with a prophetic spirit, that their adversaries were not able to resist the wisdom and spirit by which they spake; and multitudes of all ranks were by them converted to the Lord: so that in spite of all the power and policy of the Popish clergy, assisted by our rulers, and all the fiery persecutions which they raised against the professors of the gospel, the Lord was pleased, with a high hand, to ransom this land from Popish tyranny, idolatry, and superstition; so that the Pope's authority was abolished in Scotland by the parliament, the reformation established, and a sound Confession of Faith approved in the year 1560. — "This was the doing of the Lord, and most wondrous in our eyes!"

The great rule and pattern of reformation which our reformers observed, was the word of God, and the practice of the apostolic churches therein recorded, into which they made very narrow and impartial inquiry, their searches being attended with earnest prayer to God for the light and teaching of his Spirit, and communications of counsels with divines of other nations. After all which travel, they came to agree upon a platform of church government and discipline, in a due subordination of kirk sessions, presbyteries, and synods unto general assemblies; as appears from our books of discipline, which were very early received and approved by the general assemblies of this church.

Though the civil powers, after the year 1560, were favourable to the reformation; yet our reformers had great and long struggling with many who were addicted to prelacy, and several Popish errors and superstitions: but it pleased the Lord so far to countenance and help them, that a national covenant was framed and entered into for the support of the reformation. This covenant was at first subscribed by the king and his household, in the year 1580, and afterwards by persons of all ranks, in the year 1581, and again by all sorts of persons, in the year 1590; and afterwards presbyterian government, and all the pieces of reformation then attained unto, were solemnly ratified by king and parliament, in the year 1592. Only the grievance of patronage, under which the church was groaning, was not yet removed.

Here we must take occasion to adore the distinguishing goodness of God to this poor nation of Scotland, in bowing and inclining the hearts of the whole nation, as the heart of one man, to enter into a solemn national covenant with God: even the hearts of our king, our nobles, barons, gentlemen, citizens, ministers, and professors of all ranks, to make a national surrender of themselves and their posterity to the Lord; and to bind both themselves and them, to cleave to his truths and ordinances, and to promote religion and reformation in their stations. Our histories inform us how this national covenant was afterwards renewed in this early period by our general assemblies, synods, presbyteries, and particular parishes, and remarkably attended with much of the Lord's presence and countenance, and great outpourings of his Spirit; at which occasions there were to be seen floods of tears flowing from melting hearts and weeping eyes.

Calderwood, in his history, tells us of a wonderful day of this sort at the renewing of the covenant by the general assembly at Edinburgh, in the little kirk, upon the 30th March, 1596, Mr. John Davidson, minister of Salt Preston, presided as the chief actor; likewise of another such day at the renewing of the covenant by the synod of Fife, at Dunfermline, that same year, where Mr. James Melvil, minister at Kilrenny, was moderator and chief actor. Also synods and presbyteries elsewhere had precious melting-seasons, when about this work, which proved a special time of reviving to the work of God through the whole land. In this period the church of Scotland enjoyed very glorious days of the Son of man, and was honoured with large Testimonies from divines of other churches: for the great pitch of reformation she had attained unto, she was called Philadelphia, and the morning star of the reformation.

But these bright times did not long continue, clouds soon arose: for king James VI. having the view of succeeding to the crown of England, and desirous to gratify the prelatists there, did, contrary to his solemn declarations and engagements, begin to make encroachments upon the church and her liberties, about the years 1597 and 1598; and continuing so to do, there followed a long course of defection in this church, for about the space of forty years; during which time, prelacy, that bitter weed, was introduced into the government, superstition and Popish ceremonies into the worship, and Arminian and Popish errors crept into the doctrine. The king, for accomplishing his designs, got several packed assemblies convened, as those at Linlithgow, in the years 1606 and 1608; that at Glasgow, 1610; that at Aberdeen, 1616; that at St. Andrews, 1617; and at Perth, 1618; wherein one way or other he got several corruptions approved, and particularly the five articles of Perth: prelates were set up, unlawful oaths exacted of entrants into the ministry; several Popish ceremonies, with a service book, and book of canons, were imposed upon the church, and many sinfully complied therewith; whereby the church's beauty was miserably sullied, and the land greatly polluted.

Yet, during this time of grievous backsliding from a covenant reformation, it pleased the Lord to raise up several worthies, ministers, and professors of religion, to bear Testimony to the doctrine, worship, government, and discipline of this church, and to Christ's right of headship over her and her judicatories, and to his power to institute her laws and ordinances, in opposition to the encroachments then made upon the same: upon which account divers pastors were arraigned before the council, the high commission, and diocesan synods; some were deprived of their churches and benefices, some were banished, some confined, and others imprisoned, and some were sentenced to death: likewise, several gentlemen and magistrates were sorely persecuted by the domineering prelates, for not conforming to the course of defection. As for these faithful witnesses, who were suffered to live in their own land, several of them went up and down in much poverty and affliction, teaching and confirming the people of God, waiting for God's returning in mercy to his oppressed church and people. Nevertheless, in this dark hour, the Lord gave Testimony to his word in the mouths of his persecuted servants, through several corners of the land, by accompanying it with more than ordinary power and success; particularly in the year 1625, and afterwards at Stewarton, Irvine, and many other places of the West of Scotland. A famous instance of that power was given at the solemn communion celebrated at the kirk of Shotts, the 20th June, 1630, which proved a most remarkable sowing of seed through Clydesdale, and to the glory of free grace.

Afterwards, when the night seemed to be darkest, and the prelates in the height of their power and pride, competing with the nobles for all kinds of civil offices and honours, and when corruptions in doctrine, worship, and government, were like to advance more and more; the Lord was pleased to look through the cloud with pity to his distressed church, in the year 1637, and to appear for her relief, first by animating several of the common people of Edinburgh to oppose the reading of the new service-book there; and also at the same time exciting several honest ministers and professors in other parts of the nation to present supplications to the council, in September, 1637, against pressing the liturgy and canons upon them. But these, after several expresses to and from court, being at last refused, and new orders given for the use of the foresaid books; a great number of all ranks, nobility, gentry, ministers, &c. convened at Edinburgh, in February, 1638, where, after serious deliberation and prayer to God, they resolved upon reviving and renewing of the national covenant, which had almost been buried for forty years before. This they drew up and subscribed, with some additions and explications suitable to their present circumstances, and sent copies thereof through the land, which, being read in churches, was heartily embraced, sworn, and subscribed by all ranks, with many tears and great joy: so that the whole land, great and small, a very few excepted, without any compulsion from church or state, in a few months voluntarily and cheerfully returned to their ancient principles, and subjected themselves to the oath of God for reformation; and this they did when both the court and prelates were enraged against them for it. But the Lord from heaven remarkably countenanced them with the extraordinary manifestations of his presence, and down-pouring of his Spirit, both upon judicatories and the worshipping assemblies of his people, which proved as life from the dead to a poor, withered, backsliding church.

Nay, which is wonderful, things ripened so fast for reformation, that, in November, 1638, a free and lawful general assembly, indicted by the king, convened at Glasgow, the very place where prelacy was restored in the year 1610. There the general assembly, notwithstanding of the former backslidings of the ministry, came to agree, with wonderful harmony, to condemn and annul six pretended corrupt assemblies, who had changed the government and corrupted the worship of this church, together with the high commission court, the service-book, and book of canons, and the book of ordination, as also the unlawful oaths imposed upon entrants into the ministry: they likewise deposed and excommunicated the prelates, except two, for oppression and gross scandals. They approved the national covenant, and declared prelacy, with the five articles of Perth, to be abjured by it; and made sundry other acts for purging the church, and promoting reformation; and appointed the time of their next meeting, for carrying on what was so happily begun. And though the prelates with their abettors made great opposition to their godly intentions, yea, ran to court, and stirred up the king to make war against Scotland; yet the Lord was pleased so to countenance his servants and people, that the begun reformation was carried on, and at last ratified both by king and parliament in July, 1641. Thereby prelacy was abolished, and presbytery established by law; and the king being personally present, he for himself and his successors promised, in verbo principis never to come on the contrary of that settlement; which occasioned great joy through all the land, and was followed with much of the Lord's power and presence in his ordinance: so that the land that formerly was like a wilderness, was now, by the divine blessing, turned into a faithful and fruitful field.

The Lord having thus prospered the nation of Scotland in her reforming work, her neighbours in England protested a desire to join with them for carrying on the like work of reformation through the whole three kingdoms; and the English parliament sent their commissioners to Scotland for that effect. And accordingly here was a solemn league and covenant agreed upon, and sworn in the year 1643, for maintaining, advancing, and carrying on a work of reformation in the three kingdoms of Scotland, England, and Ireland. In this covenant all ranks engaged, bound themselves to personal reformation, and in their several stations to endeavour national reformation; to preserve the Protestant religion, abolish Popery, Prelacy, superstition, schism, profaneness, and whatsoever shall be found contrary to sound doctrine and the power of godliness; and to endeavour to bring the three kingdoms to the nearest conjunction and uniformity in religion, as to doctrine, worship, and government, according to the word of God, and the example of the best reformed churches; that so they and their posterity after them might, as brethren, live in faith and love, that the Lord might be one, and his name one through the three kingdoms. This indeed was a glorious design, had the English parliament and people been truly and heartily sincere in it as the Scots nation, both parliament and general assembly, were, who with one voice approved and swore this covenant themselves, and recommended it to all others through the land, who generally received it with great enlargements of heart, and expressions of gladness, as they had done the national covenant in the year 1638. It is true, the parliament of England took the covenant, as did the city of London, the Westminster assembly, and many others in England, though there were but few of them who seemed to mind it much afterwards. Some good things, indeed, were thereupon done; for in consequence of this covenant, and the uniformity in religion engaged unto therein, the English hierarchy and liturgy were laid aside for a time, our present Confession of faith was agreed upon by the assembly of divines at Westminster, with commissioners from this church, together with the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, the Directory for Worship, with a Directory for Church Government, Church Censures, and Ordination of Ministers. As all these were agreed upon by the Westminster assembly, as a part of the covenanted uniformity in religion which was to be settled through the three kingdoms, so they were received after examination, and approved by our general assemblies and parliaments in Scotland. It is true, there were several acts and ordinances of the English parliament for establishing these in England: but they took little effect, because of the opposition which was made to the form of Presbyterian government, by the Independents and sectaries there.

Notwithstanding of this defection in England, the nation and church of Scotland pursued reformation according to their covenant engagements, and got several laws enacted both by church and state, for carrying on the same; and particularly, they got an excellent act passed by the parliament, for abolishing the patronages of kirks, which is worthy to be written in letters of gold, a part whereof we shall here transcribe. "At Edinburgh, March 9th, 1649. The estates of parliament being sensible of the great obligation that lies upon them by the national covenant, and by the solemn league and covenant, and by many deliverances and mercies from God, and by the late solemn engagement unto duties, to preserve the doctrine, and maintain and vindicate the liberties of the kirk of Scotland, and to advance the work of reformation therein to the utmost of their power: and considering that patronages and presentations of kirks, is an evil and bondage under which the Lord's people and ministers of this land have long groaned, and that it hath no warrant in God's word, but is founded only on the common law, and is a custom Popish, and brought into the church in time of ignorance and superstition; and that the same is contrary to the second book of discipline, in which, upon solid and good ground, it is reckoned among abuses that are desired to be reformed, and unto the free calling and entry of ministers unto their charge: and the said estates, being willing and desirous to promote and advance the reformation aforesaid, that every thing in the house of God may be ordered according to his word and commandment; do therefore, from the sense of former obligations, and upon the former grounds and reasons, discharge for ever hereafter all patronages and presentations of kirks, whether belonging to the king, or to any laick patron, presbyteries, or others within this kingdom, as being unlawful and unwarrantable by God's word, and contrary to the doctrine and liberties of this kirk." Afterwards they say, "And it is further declared and ordained, That if any presentation shall hereafter be given, procured, or received, that the same is null and of none effect; and that it is lawful for presbyteries to reject the same, and to refuse to admit any to trials thereupon; and, notwithstanding thereof, to proceed to the planting of the kirk upon the suit and calling, or with the consent of the congregation, on whom none is to be obtruded against their will," &c. By which excellent act it is evident, that our reforming nobility and gentry, many whereof were patrons themselves, looked upon themselves as under strong obligations, both from the word of God and their covenant engagements, to abolish patronages, and restore the liberty of congregations in calling of their ministers.

Thus our reforming ancestors were helped to many excellent things from 1638 to 1650, for promoting reformation in the land, though at the same time, it must be owned, they were not free of mistakes and wrong steps in their management. There is no period here, the church can be said to be without spot or wrinkle.

which tended to stop the progress of reformation-work, and made way at length for restoring of prelacy. This was occasioned by some ensnaring questions put to the commission in December, 1650, by the king and parliament, which they had better declined to answer, concerning the admission of persons into places of public trust, civil and military, who formerly had been oppressors of the covenanted reformation, upon their making public profession of their repentance; those who were for admitting them being called public resolutioners, and those against it being called protestors. There were many eminently good and great men upon both sides, and some as eminent who joined neither side. The point seemed narrow for the church to carry the difference to such a height as to suspend and depose one another upon it as they did, according as parties had the upper hand in synods and presbyteries: for Cromwell, the usurper, would not then allow them to meet in general assemblies, by which the division possibly might have been healed. But this fatal division looked like a judicial stroke from heaven upon the church for their sins: the Lord's "judgments are a great deep." Possibly there might be too great compliances in this matter with court-measures, and the humours of great men, as there were afterwards in the matter of indulgences, tolerations, and other ensnaring things brought in by the court upon the church. It is certain, that the greatest number of the strict and zealous ministers were on the protestors' side, who afterwards made a noble stand against prelacy. And it appeared afterwards, by the protestors' fears, which they expressed, that these men when taken into a place of trust, would soon act the old game, were but too well founded. It must also be acknowledged, that though the most part of the public resolutioners submitted to prelacy, yet several worthy men among them did not, and were exposed to sufferings for it as well as others.

At the time of the breaking out of these fatal divisions among us, an army of sectaries under Cromwell invaded and oppressed us. These sectaries had grown to such a height in the English army, that they invaded the parliament of England their masters, put away the house of peers, modelled the house of commons according to their pleasure, and erected a new court called the high court of justice, before which they impanelled king Charles I. and violently took away his life, January 30th, 1649; against which our commissioners both from church and state in Scotland, then at London, protested, and were therefore hardly used. Immediately thereupon, Scotland proclaimed his son Charles II. their king, and out of conscience to their covenant, sent for him, and crowned him at Scone, where he solemnly swore the covenant, January 1st, 1651. All which drew down the wrath of the sectarian army upon us, who invaded the land, shed much blood, conquered us, and kept us in bondage ten years. During which time, a sinful toleration of sectarian errors was granted by Cromwell and his council in Scotland, which brought in great looseness both in principle and practice; which toleration was faithfully witnessed against both by the presbytery of Edinburgh, and a good number of ministers in the provinces of Perth and Fife, as appears by their testimonies published in the year 1659.

Soon after this the yoke of the oppressor was broken, and the king peaceably restored in the year 1660, to the joy of the whole land, who thereupon expected good days both to church and state. (And, alas, the most part went to dreadful excess in jollity and drunkenness upon this event.) But, ah! soon was their joy turned to mourning, soon was their oppression in conscience doubled, the late glorious work of reformation razed, and all its carved works broken down with axes and hammers, as it were, all at once. For king Charles II., after his restoration, having called a parliament in England, they restored abjured prelacy with the service book and ceremonies, which had been laid aside: whereupon about two thousand ministers there, who could not in conscience conform thereunto, were cast out at Bartholomew day, August 24, 1662. He likewise called a Parliament in Scotland, who in the years 1661 and 1662, removed all the legal securities of the Church of Scotland, and work of reformation therein. By that unparalleled act rescissory, they annulled all the parliaments which had met from 1640 to 1654; they asserted the king's supremacy in all causes, civil and ecclesiastic, and declared all meetings and assemblies, leagues, and covenants, without the king's authority, to be unlawful and unwarrantable, and devolved the power of settling the government of the church upon the king; they declared the national covenant, as sworn in the year 1638, and the solemn league and covenant, to be unlawful oaths, and all men to be free from the obligation of them; and they declared all that was done from 1638 to 1650, in prosecution of a covenanted reformation, to be rebellious and treasonable.

The king's prerogative and supremacy in church affairs being thus screwed up, he by a proclamation declared his royal pleasure to be for restoring the government of the church by archbishops and bishops, as it was exercised in the year 1637. In the meantime Mr. James Sharp, minister at Craill, who had formerly been entrusted to act for the church, but now betrayed her, went to London with other three ministers, and were consecrated bishops in the prelatie sense, having first been ordained deacons, after that presbyters. according to the form of the church of England, (This the prelates set up by king James VI. would not submit to.) Thereafter these, returning from London to Edinburgh, consecrated the rest of the bishops. Then they all took their seats in parliament, where they got new acts made in their favour, commanding all ministers to obey them, and attend their diocesan meetings. A little before this, the meetings of synods, presbyteries, and kirk-sessions, had been discharged by the privy council, until they should be authorized by the bishops, who were soon to enter upon the government of their respective sees: whereupon, at the time of the meeting of provincial synods in April thereafter, several noblemen and gentlemen were sent to raise them by force. It is to be regretted, that synods at this time so readily dismissed, and that presbyteries and kirk-sessions were deserted also, without any suitable testimony or remonstrance against these fearful encroachments and alterations.

One thing that contributed much to hinder any joint testimony, and to strike terror into many, was the severe treatment which some faithful ministers met with, when essaying a testimony of this sort: for Mr. James Guthrie, minister at Stirling, with some few other ministers, having met in a private house in Edinburgh, soon after the king's return, to draw up a supplication to him, wherein, after congratulating his return, they humbly put him in mind of his oaths unto and covenants with God, for maintaining the true Protestant religion, as established by acts of parliament and general assembly, &c., for this they were apprehended and imprisoned 23d August, 1660, and all such meetings and petitions were discharged as seditious. And, to strike the greater terror, Mr. James Guthrie was indicted before the parliament of high treason; and, being singularly faithful and zealous for carrying on reformation, he was condemned to die, and his head to be set upon one of the ports of the city of Edinburgh. He was accordingly executed the 1st of June, 1661, and his head set up on the Nether-bow port, which continued there till the revolution, as a public witness against the woeful defections of a cruel perfidious generation. Likewise the worthy and renowned marquis of Argyle was five days before executed upon the same account, and his head set up upon the tolbooth of Edinburgh, to the great reproach of the nation; and some time after, Lord Waristoun suffered in the same manner; three eminently great and good men, who died with the resolution and Christianity of the ancient martyrs. Now, what could be expected from a reign and a government whose foundation was laid in cruelty, and soaked with the precious blood of God's saints?

After this the parliament and council went on in their cruel and persecuting designs against faithful ministers who would not conform to anti-scriptural prelacy, take presentations from patrons, and collations from bishops, and also take an oath to the king, which they called an oath of allegiance, wherein they behoved to own his supremacy in all cases civil and ecclesiastic: some of these ministers they banished out of all his majesty's dominions: these generally went to Holland, and were kindly received there. Besides these, several hundreds were summarily ordered to leave their churches, and remove from their congregations: with which orders, it must be owned, they did too easily comply, merely upon proclamations by the council, before they were thrust out by force; thereby leaving their poor flocks to corrupt teachers that were afterwards thrust in upon them, and not giving a due testimony against such a tyrannical act and encroachment upon the spiritual kingly power and headship of our Lord Jesus Christ, who is the only Lord of our ministry, and of the exercise thereof. Likewise, by act of parliament, all the subjects were required to attend those who were thrust into their parishes, and other conformists, in their meetings for worship, and that in acknowledgment of, and hearty compliance with his majesty's government ecclesiastic; which indeed the far greatest part did, whereby all degrees of persons through the land were miserably involved in the breach of covenant, and defections of the time. Nay, the wickedness of this period came to such a pitch, that our national covenant, and the solemn league, were ordered by public authority to be most ignominiously burnt at several market-crosses, to the fearful dishonouring of the great tremendous God, with whom these covenants were made.

After some time's silence, the ejected ministers began to be convinced it was their duty to preach the gospel, at the earnest desire of their people, who declined to hear the curates who were thrust in upon them, though sorely harrassed for it; and that they ought to preach, notwithstanding the prohibitions of the magistrates, especially when they saw what sort of men were thrust in upon the people. At first they had worship only in private houses in the most peaceable and harmless manner; but the cruel prelates and rulers would not bear with any such meetings; so that at length, by their severities, they were driven from houses to the fields for more safety. But still severer laws were made against all such meetings, whether in the houses or fields. Nay, they came even to that height to enact, Charl. II. parl. 2. sess. 2. 1670, "That if any man shall preach or pray in the fields, or in any house, where there shall be more hearers than the house contains, so as some of them be without doors, he shall be punished with death and confiscation of goods." So that, by this terrible law, two or three hearkening at honest men's doors or windows in time of family-worship, though posted there out of malice or mere curiosity, exposed the worshippers of God to a cruel death. These and such like laws tended to banish family-worship out of the land, and were too successful that way. Likewise severe punishments were enacted against the hearers of ejected ministers, and those who did not hear the parish ministers, or employed others to baptize their children. And they proceeded to incredible barbarities against non-conformists, both ministers and people. Yet, in these cruel persecuting times, the Lord gave testimony to the word of his grace, and blessed his ordinances, though prohibited by men, with very remarkable success; and the more pains the persecuting prelates and their instruments were at to suppress these assemblies, the more numerous they grew, and the parish-churches were the more deserted.

When methods of force and cruelty could not prevail to stop these assemblies, they fell upon more crafty ways, by granting indulgence to some of the ejected ministers to preach in vacant churches, under certain limitations: such as, Their being confined within their parishes, and not encouraging those of other congregations to resort to them; their forbearing to lecture before sermon; their not preaching in church-yards; their not admitting ministers who were not indulged to assist them, &c. This indulgence, and prescribing rules to ministers, being ordered by the king and his council, by virtue of his ecclesiastic supremacy, now established by law, was on the magistrate's part a sinful encroachment upon Christ's headship over the church. And though poor harassed ministers might be glad of any little breathing-time for the exercise of their ministry in the midst of heavy sufferings, yet, if any of them accepted of the magistrate's indulgence upon the conditions and restrictions prescribed, they cannot be justified therein; but, as for those worthy ministers who left all for Christ and their conscience, and suffered greatly for not complying with prelacy, and other defections of their time, and who always refused that they accepted the indulgence upon the terms of the king and council, though they preached in the churches they assigned, neither observed these terms while they enjoyed the benefits, and were afterwards turned out again upon that account; it were hard to charge them with approving of the king's usurped supremacy: though, at the same time, we wish they had given a more full and explicit Testimony against the Erastian encroachments of the magistrate, than we can learn they did. Yet, notwithstanding hereof, God was pleased to glorify his sovereign grace, in giving remarkable success to the labours and ministry of those indulged in churches, as well as those who preached in the fields, between whom there continued much love and peace for many years; until once some began to condemn the indulged so far, as to preach up separation from them; upon which followed very sad and mournful divisions among the people of God, even while under violent persecution, the fruits whereof continue to this very day.

At this time, many conscience-debauching oaths, declarations, and bonds, were imposed upon the people of this land, for engaging them to own the king's supremacy over all persons, and in all causes; to renounce our covenants, with defensive arms, and all the former steps taken for carrying on reformation. Among others, that self-contradictory oath of the Test was imposed, and made a handle for persecuting many of all ranks and stations. They who refused these oaths, and did not conform to prelacy as required, were exposed to the greatest cruelties, being put to wander about in deserts and mountains, and to lodge in dens and caves of the earth. Multitudes were banished their native country; many suffered long imprisonment, and that in the most miserable and unhealthful places; others were fined and spoiled of their goods, and many pillaged and plundered by merciless soldiers and barbarous Highlanders let loose upon them; husbands were exorbitantly fined, and entirely ruined for their wives absenting from the parish churches, though it was not in their power to help it; preaching, praying, or even hearing, at meetings not authorized by law, was made death: yea, refusing to witness against those guilty of the crimes of preaching, praying, or hearing, was also punishable with death. Simple conversing with persons forfeited or intercommuned, though our nearest relations, husbands, wives, parents, children, &c., or giving them any supply when starving, or the not revealing the giving or demanding of it, was declared treason, so that men were exposed to a cruel death for pure charity.

The privy council in those days assumed a parliamentary power, and made acts and laws even more bloody than those of the parliament: and though these were most cruel and barbarous in themselves, yet they were often more barbarously put in execution: so that this poor land became a miserable field of blood, cruelty, and defection. Many of all ranks, noblemen, gentlemen, ministers, citizens, and commons, had their blood shed on scaffolds, as if they had been the greatest malefactors, and their heads and members set up on pinnacles to the view of the world. Many were tortured with boots, thumbkins, fire-matches, &c., to force them to discover their secret thoughts of state matters, accuse themselves or others, and answer such questions as judges pleased to ask at them. To such a height of cruelty and tyranny were things carried, that full power was given to merciless soldiers both to be judges and executioners of innocent people; so that in time of peace, without any witnesses or form of law, they cut off many in the open fields and highways, and dragged several out of their houses, and murdered them, if they did not take such oaths or answer such questions as they put to them; and sometimes would not give them so much time, before killing them, as to pray to God for mercy. Thus was the land soaked with blood, for the planting and growth of the bitter root of prelacy therein. Ah! have we not cause to fear that the Lord pled a controversy with us, as he did with Judah many years after, for the sins of Manasseh, and the innocent blood that he shed, which, it is said, "the Lord would not pardon?" 2 Kings xxiv. 3, 4. O that the land were purged from it!

After king Charles's death, king James, a professed Papist, succeeded to him in the year 1685, when not only our civil liberties, but the Protestant religion, was ready to be sacrificed: for he was admitted to the government without taking the coronation oath, which binds the king to maintain it: and our parliament, when they met, made an offer of duty to the king, wherein they openly declared for the king's absolute power and authority, and promised to give him entire obedience, without reserve. This engagement surely was blasphemous, being only proper to the sovereign majesty of God. Upon such encouragement, the king took upon him, by virtue of his absolute power and prerogative-royal, to dispense with laws at his pleasure, and particularly to suspend all penal laws against Papists, and to allow them the free exercise of their religion. Sometime after, viz., 28th June, 1687, he, by his proclamation, suspended all penal and sanguinary laws made against other nonconformists, viz., Presbyterians: and gave them leave to worship God in their own way in houses, enjoining them to take care that nothing be preached or taught among them that might anywise tend to alienate the hearts of his people from him or his government; and to signify to the next magistrate what places they make use of, with the names of the preachers. Presbyterian ministers generally accepted of this liberty, and those who were abroad returned home, and got meeting-houses fitted up for them, and multitudes flocked to attend their ministry, and found it remarkably blessed to them. This toleration indeed proceeded from a vile spring, viz., the king's absolute dispensing power; yet divine providence made use of it, contrary to the design of the granter, as a mean to bring home the banished, and prepare the way for the happy revolution that soon followed upon it. There is in the proclamation an injunction upon ministers to preach nothing that tended to alienate the hearts of the subjects from the king and his government. If the meaning of that was, that in their sermons they should give no Testimony against Popery or the toleration of it, it was sinful in any minister to comply with it. But we ought in charity to believe that these faithful ministers, who had long given proof, by their sufferings, of their zeal for Christ and his cause, had no regard to the injunction in that sense, but exonerated their consciences in testifying against the errors and corruptions of the day, and for which some were imprisoned at that time. No doubt those who had been long oppressed in their consciences, had their blood mingled with their sacrifices, and wanted ordinances, would be glad of a breathing time to serve the Lord. But, alas, we have it to regret, that "in every thing we offend, and come short of the glory of God." Ah! we and our fathers have sinned, and we have great cause to be deeply humbled both for their sins and our own.

But, behold how the mercy of God appeared for us, after innumerable provocations, and when all ranks had made fearful defections from God and their engagements to him. And after this church had lain under sad oppression for near twenty-eight years, and Popery was far advanced, and the civil power in the hands of Papists, and there was but little wanting to accomplish the ruin both of our civil and religious liberties; the mighty Lord stepped in, and made a wonderful appearance for us, by sending over the prince of Orange, afterwards proclaimed king, in November, 1688, to rescue us from Popery and tyranny, and that at a time after several attempts for our relief had misgiven, and the hearts of all true Protestants were beginning to faint within them, and the Popish faction had a numerous army to support them. Yet, now, when God's time was come, our deliverance was brought about with great facility, through the wonderful working and concurrence of divine providence: so that "it was not our own arm, but the Lord's right hand, that wrought this salvation" for us, a salvation never to be forgotten by the friends of religion and liberty. In particular, the church of Scotland ought always to commemorate the glorious deliverance and revolution in 1688, whereby she was raised out of the dust, and to be thankful to the great God the Author thereof, and to have a savoury remembrance of the name of king William, the happy instrument of it under God. Since which the Lord hath granted her fifty-five years freedom from persecution, and peaceable enjoyment of gospel-ordinances and church judicatories, such as she never had since the reformation. Though! alas! we must acknowledge with shame, that we have not improved such noble opportunities for God and his glory, as we ought to have done.

The prince of Orange having, in his declaration for Scotland, shown a great concern for our religious and civil liberties, and for the persecuted Presbyterians in Scotland, whose sufferings he was well informed of by our refugees in Holland from time to time; the Presbyterian ministers met and addressed him, congratulating his arrival in Britain, and thanking him for his declaration; wherein they complain of the overturning of the Presbyterian government, which was generally received as of divine right, and of the establishing of prelacy contrary to solemn engagements. When the prince came to the throne, and had the government in his hands, he acted agreeably to his declaration: and though he did not all for us we could have wished, yet we have good ground to be assured of king William's hearty inclinations to serve the church of Scotland, and his willingness to have done much more for her than he did. But it was our unhappiness, as well as his, that he had a prelatie church in England to manage and gratify, among whom the Scottish prelates wanted not abundance of friends to agent daily for them: these proved great clogs and hindrances to the king's gracious intentions: yet notwithstanding he did a great deal to raise up a poor sinking church from imminent ruin, which we ought never to forget.

Through the encouragement of this declaration, and call to our states, a convention of states met at Edinburgh, in April, 1689, who formed a claim of right, setting forth the grievances and privileges of the nation, and among the rest declaring, that "prelacy, and the superiority of any office in the church above presbyters, is and hath been a great and insupportable grievance and trouble to this nation, and contrary to the inclinations of the generality of the people ever since the reformation, (they having reformed from Popery by presbyters,) and therefore ought to be abolished." And the said convention being afterwards turned into a parliament, the king and queen, with their advice and consent, in July, 1689, formally abolished prelacy, and rescinded all acts and statutes formerly passed in favour of it. There was also the draught of an act brought in, and twice read in parliament, for excluding all those from places of public trust, who had a share in the oppressions of the former reigns: but the more zealous part in the parliament had not strength to carry it, and therefore it was dropped, to the great prejudice of both church and state. The earls Melvil, Crawford, and several others, were very friendly to Presbyterians: yet they could not this session of parliament carry an act for restoring Presbyterian government, partly because several leading members were either inclined to Episcopacy, or pretended to dread the tyranny of Presbytery; and partly because the enemies of this church had so much interest in severals about the king to cast remoras in the way. Yet a good many Episcopal ministers were by the council turned out of their churches, for not praying for king William and queen Mary, and for other acts of disloyalty.

Next year, April, 1690, an act of parliament was passed for restoring all the surviving Presbyterian ministers to their churches, who had been thrust from them since January 1661, for not conforming to prelacy and the courses of the time. Likewise, they rescinded the act for the king's supremacy in ecclesiastical causes. June 7th, 1690, they passed an act for ratifying the Confession of Faith, now received among us, after it was read in their presence: also they established Presbyterian government and discipline, as it was settled by 14th act, James VI. parl. 12. 1592, except that part of it relating to patronages; they rescinded many acts which were made against presbytery, and for prelacy, and of the five articles of Perth, the Test, &c., and appointed the first meeting of the general assembly to be in October 1690. It is to be observed, that, in the act establishing Presbyterian government, they establish it, not only as agreeable to the inclinations of the people as in the claim of right, but also as agreeable to the word of God, and most conducive to the advancement of true piety and godliness. And by that act they expressly rescinded all other acts, laws, statutes, and proclamations, in so far as they are contrary to, or inconsistent with, the Protestant religion and Presbyterian government now established; which includes all the unrighteous acts of the late reigns against the church.

By their 23d act, they abolished patronages, and gave liberty to parishes to call their own ministers. By act 27th and 28th, they rescinded the persecuting laws of the former period; whereby men's consciences were delivered from the thralldom of ensnaring oaths, and of attending any worship against their light. Likewise, they passed an act for rescinding the fines and forfeitures of the former reigns: which was a public condemnation of the oppression and cruelty thereof. Surely then we must own that these were not small things which king William and his parliament did for this poor church when lying in the dust. Some at a distance may make light of them, because every thing was not done they would have had; but surely Christians of solid judgment, and those who groaned so long under the heavy bondage and sufferings of those times, were made to acknowledge with thankfulness, that it was the Lord's right hand that turned again the captivity of our Zion. Our restored captives were then surprised with their liberty; they were like men that dreamed, amazed at the works of the Lord, and obliged to say, "The Lord hath done great things for us."

In consequence of the act of parliament, the first general assembly met at Edinburgh, October 16, 1690, after about forty years' interruption, where was a great gathering of old banished suffering ministers, who had survived the long storm of persecution that lay upon this tossed and afflicted church. These ministers had several general meetings before this: in one of them they agreed that the first day of the assembly's meeting should be kept as a day of solemn fasting and humiliation, which was observed accordingly by prayer and preaching both fore and afternoon, their majesties' high commissioner, lord Carmichael, joining with them in that good work. Afterwards king William's letter to the assembly was presented, in which he expressed his affection to them, but pressed calmness and moderation in their proceedings in very strong terms; yea, tells them, that his authority should never be a tool to their irregular passions. In answer to this letter, the assembly say:—"They received this letter with all the joy and thankfulness that the rising and shining again of the royal favour upon this long-afflicted and distressed church could possibly inspire. The God of love, the Prince of peace, with all the providences that have gone over us, and circumstances that we are under, as well as your majesty's obliging pleasure, require of us a calm and peaceable procedure. And if, after the violence for conscience sake, that we have suffered and so much detested, and those grievous abuses of authority in the late reigns, whereby, through some men's irregular passions, we have so sadly smarted, we ourselves should lapse into the same errors, we should certainly prove the most unjust towards God, foolish towards ourselves, and ungrateful towards your majesty, of all men upon earth." Afterwards they say, "Desiring in all things to approve ourselves unto God as the true disciples of Jesus Christ, who, though most zealous against all corruptions in his church, was most gentle towards the persons of men." But, notwithstanding of all this moderation of the assembly, the prelatical party raised great clamours against them at court, and through England, for their severity. But, as the assembly observe in their foresaid answer to the king, "Great revolutions of this nature must be attended with occasions of complaint; and even the worst of men are ready to cry out of wrong for their justest deservings."

This assembly was much concerned to get Presbyterians united among themselves, who, under the late persecution, had been woefully divided by means of the indulgences and toleration granted by the civil government; and, to compass this design, they received into fellowship with this church and her judicatories, three ministers, Messrs. Linning, Shields, and Boyd, who had carried the point of separation on the fore-said accounts to too great a height; but now promised to live in union with, and subjection to, the judicatories of the church for the future; having at the same time given in a long paper for the exoneration of their consciences, bearing testimony to what they judged right, and against what they took to be wrong. These three ministers afterwards proved eminently useful in the church and in the judicatories, and contributed greatly to heal the schism that was among us.

This church having been long overwhelmed with ruins, this assembly, 1690, had much work to do, to remove some of the rubbish, and establish some order: they had multitudes of curates remaining in the churches still to deal with; they had civil rulers urging a coalition with, or comprehension of, many of them; they had divisions among themselves to heal, and many other difficulties to grapple with. Amidst all these they did a great many things, such as appointing all ministers, elders, and probationers, to subscribe the Confession of Faith; making acts for keeping the Lord's day, and for applying to the parliament to alter markets from Saturdays and Mondays, for erecting schools in the Highlands, providing them with Irish bibles, for rescinding the sentences passed by the public resolutioners and protestors against one another. They appointed large committees or commissions for visiting several parts of the national church, with instructions how to manage; they also appointed two of their number to repair to London, to wait upon the king concerning the affairs of this church. And for further healing of their schisms, turning away the wrath of God, and imploring his mercy, they appointed a national fast to be observed on the second Thursday of January thereafter: in the causes whereof, they enumerate a great many sins of the land, both in the former and present times; such as, "Ingratitude for mercies, treacherous dealing with God, insteadfastness in his covenant, falling from their first love, open defection of all ranks from the ways of God, by horrid immoralities, and sacrificing the interest of Christ and privileges of his church to the will and lusts of men, introducing Prelacy, imposing and taking unlawful oaths, shedding innocent blood, the general fainting under the late persecutions, and even of eminent ministers, by either yielding to the defections and evils of the time, or not giving seasonable and necessary testimony against them; ignorance and neglect of Christ, and of living by faith on him; contempt of the gospel, and barrenness under it; want of holiness and piety towards God, and of love and charity towards men; the most part being more ready to censure the sins of others, than to repent of their own." These, and a great many other evils, they mention as a ground of fasting. It has indeed been complained of, that the hints given of some of these evils are too general. No doubt, if the drawing of the act had been put in some hands, these had been more particularly and fully expressed, and the assembly would not have scrupled to have approved the act in that shape. It is wished the act had been more full and explicit, with respect to the shedding of the blood of God's saints and martyrs under prelaey, the king's ecclesiastical supremacy then advanced to a most blasphemous height, the self-contradictory oath of the abominable test, and the fearful indignities done to our covenants, which we find mentioned by subsequent assemblies, and for which there is cause of mourning and humiliation to this day. Likewise we wish they had done more to retrieve the honour of these broken and burned covenants, by openly asserting the lawfulness and obligation of them, and applying to the civil powers for their concurrence to renew them, or rather of one made up of both, with accommodation to their times and circumstances. No doubt they were well apprised of the opposition that would be made to such a motion, as they found made to other such designs, and particularly to that of purging the church, and keeping out of judicatories those who were enemies to it; in which they met with strenuous opposition from statesmen and great men in power, and even from the throne itself; as appears from the king to the commission of assembly 1690, and his letter to assembly 1692, wherein he presses strongly their uniting with the Episcopal ministers then in churches. His commissioner, the earl of Lothian, seconded the king's letter; and, because they fell not in with it, he said he had orders to dissolve the assembly, which he did, without naming a diet for another.

And here we cannot but observe the noble spirit and disposition of the assembly 1692, which they showed upon that occasion. The moderator, Mr. William Crichton, in his speech to the commissioner, delivered himself as follows: "May it please your grace, this assembly, and all the members of this national church, are under the greatest obligations possible to his majesty: and, if his majesty's commands to us had been in any or all our concerns in the world, we would have laid our hands upon our mouth and been silent; but they being for a dissolution of this assembly, without indicting another to a certain day, therefore, having been moderator to this assembly, I in their name, they adhering to me, humbly crave leave to declare, that the office-bearers in the house of God have a spiritual intrinsic power from Jesus Christ, the only Head of his church, to meet in assembly about the affairs thereof, the necessity of the same being first represented to the magistrates; and further, I humbly crave, that the dissolution of this assembly, without indicting a new one to a certain day, may not be to the prejudice of our yearly general assemblies granted us by the laws of the kingdom." Here the members rose up, and with one voice declared their adherence to what the moderator had said. Whereupon, the moderator turning himself to the assembly, as if he was to pray, the members, by a general cry, pressed to name a diet for the next general assembly. The moderator thereupon said, That, if they pleased, the next general assembly might meet here at Edinburgh, upon the third Wednesday of August, 1693 years. And the members again with one voice declared their approbation thereof. Wherefore those who know the difficulties our ancestors had then to struggle with, will rather be inclined to pity than censure them, and to bless God that helped them to do so well; though still it must be owned, it would have been much for the church's exoneration, that matters had been more plainly and closely laid to the door of the state, that the world might have seen where the step was.

Nevertheless, by that wonderful revolution, all persecution was stopt, and the church enjoyed the freedom of gospel-ordinances; the Lord gave large Testimony to the word of his grace, and there were great days of the "Son of man" in many places of the land, and multitudes of souls were brought in to Jesus Christ their Saviour. Likewise judicatories did many good things, some of which we shall instance.

The general assembly, in the years 1694, 1697, 1698, and subsequent years, showed great zeal for suppressing profaneness and immorality, by making many acts to that purpose, and by applying to the parliament to concur with them by the civil authority; who were pleased to revive former acts, and make several excellent new acts for that end, which the assembly appointed to be read, together with their own acts, frequently from the pulpits. Likewise, it was the care and business of the general assembly, for many years, to get the north and Highlands supplied and planted with proper ministers; they sent divers committees of the most experienced ministers to purge and plant the north, and transported many of the best ministers of the south to that country.

These first assemblies, and severals since, have made strict laws with respect to licensing preachers, not only about their learning, orthodoxy, and prudence; but have appointed presbyteries "to make narrow inquiry into their moral character and piety, and what sense and impressions they have of religion upon their own souls; and they declare that such as are esteemed to be vain, imprudent, proud or worldly-minded, by the generality of sober intelligent persons who converse with them, shall be kept back from that sacred work." Happy were it for the church, if these excellent rules were strictly observed by all the presbyteries of this church.

They made acts against the atheistical opinions of the Deists and others. They condemned the errors of Madame Bourignon, and deposed Dr. Garden for espousing them. They strictly appointed all ministers and preachers to subscribe the Confession of Faith. And for preserving of truth, and for preventing the corrupting of youth with error and immorality, they appointed all schoolmasters, chaplains, and governors of youth, to subscribe the Confession of Faith; and those who do not so, or are guilty of negligence, error, or immorality, they appointed presbyteries to apply to magistrates, heritors, &c., to get them removed from their offices. They also enacted, That those who should receive license or ordination from any of the late prelates, should be incapable of ministerial communion with this church, till they give evidence of their repentance.

They made excellent barrier acts, for preventing all innovations in our doctrine, worship, or government, by appointing that all these acts which are to be binding rules and constitutions to the church, shall first be proposed as overtures to the assembly, and be transmitted by them to the several presbyteries of this church, that they may send their opinions or consent to the next assembly, who may then pass the same into acts, if the more general opinion of the church, thus had, agreed thereunto. They made many acts, and frequent applications to the government, for suppressing and preventing the growth of popery; and encouraged students and preachers having Irish, that they might be useful in those parts; and still continue to send such to assist the ministers where popery abounds, by preaching, catechising, and instructing of the people, for counteracting the trafficking priests among them: in which design our sovereign new concurs, by the yearly bounty of a thousand pounds sterling. Also the assembly have been at great pains to get schools erected in every parish throughout the land, and appointed ministers to see that none be suffered to neglect the teaching of their children to read, and that the poor be taught upon charity.

to their instructions, sent four worthy ministers, Messrs. Shields, Boreland, Stobo, and Dalglish, with the Scottish colony to America; and one great design was for propagating the gospel, and converting the heathen in those parts. The assembly 1700 appointed a national fast, and one special ground was for their success. Of which they acquainted them by a letter, in which they directed them, upon their landing and settling in America, "to keep a day with all the people for solemn prayer and fasting, bewailing former sins, renewing baptismal engagements, and, with the greatest seriousness, dedicating themselves and the land unto the Lord." The assembly 1704 set on foot that noble project of propagating Christian knowledge in the Highlands, islands, and foreign parts of the world, by erecting charity-schools and otherwise, which they began by a voluntary subscription and contribution through the nation, instructing their commissioner to encourage and carry on the said design, which was done from time to time, until they obtained letters patent from the sovereign, anno 1709, for erecting the subscribers into a society and corporation for managing that affair; and many collections have our assemblies appointed for that blessed design, whereby, and by donations from pious persons both at home and abroad to the society, their stock is greatly increased, and they are now enabled to maintain above 130 charity-schools in our Highlands and islands at home, besides several missionaries in America, for propagating Christianity among the heathen. And we have certain information of the happy success of these schools at home; thousands of ignorant and barbarous people have been civilized and reformed, and many of them, we hope, have become truly religious. Likewise, the assembly have been at great pains to get new impressions of the bible in Irish, and also to get the Psalms, Confession of Faith, Larger and Shorter Catechisms, translated into Irish, and dispersed through the Highlands; and by the help of piously disposed persons, both in this and our neighbouring nation, they have got to the number of eighty libraries settled in particular places through the Highlands and islands. And what reason have we and all Scotchmen to give thanks to God for directing, countenancing, and prospering this noble design so far in our land? They also established an excellent form of process in church judicatories with relation to scandals and censures, by act 11. ass. 1707; likewise an useful method for ministerial visitation of families, by act 10. ass. 1708.

These and many other good things, have our old suffering ministers and our general assembly been instruments, under God, to set on foot and promote, since the revolution; for which we desire always to offer up our hearty thanksgiving and praises to almighty God, for helping them so far in advancing our holy religion.

It has been indeed complained by some, that after the revolution they did not pass distinct rescissory acts, for Christ's Headship over his church, the Divine right of Presbytery, the Church's Intrinsic Power, the Obligation of our Covenants, &c. No doubt it might be some stop to them, that the magistrate entertained a jealous eye then upon the church, with respect to these points, lest they should have carried matters to too great heights against those who differed from them; and therefore the king and parliament, parl. 1. sess. 2. rescinded all the old acts in favour of the church which enjoined civil pains upon their sentences of excommunication. Yet, notwithstanding, we wish they had done more, if possible, for asserting these principles which they held, than they did, immediately after the revolution. Had they foreseen what a handle their not doing it would have given to some to promote a separation from this church, we persuade ourselves they would have essayed to have done more. Those old sufferers indeed might reckon that the world was sufficiently apprised of their principles with respect to foresaid points, and that no man would question them, seeing they had hazarded the loss of all things for adhering to them; for it was upon that very account they were cast out of their houses and benefices, imprisoned, fined, banished, and hunted as partridges on the mountains. And although they passed not distinct assertory acts with respect to these points, yet we have plain declarations of their mind about them in several public acts and deeds. It was upon their solicitation that the parliament, June 7, 1690, passed an act for establishing Presbyterian government among us, as being agreeable to the word of God; and at the same time ratified our Confession of Faith, and inserted it verbatim in their public records, in which Confession it is expressly asserted, chap. 30. sect. 1, 2, "The Lord Jesus, as King and Head of his church, hath therein appointed a government in the hand of church officers, distinct from the civil magistrate. To those officers the keys of the kingdom of heaven are committed," &c. And, chap. 26. sect. 6, "There is no head of the Church but the Lord Jesus Christ." And, chap. 23. sect. 3, "The civil magistrate may not assume to himself the administration of the word and sacraments, or the power of the keys of the kingdom of heaven," &c. Likewise they rescinded the act for the king's supremacy in church affairs. Our first assembly, by many acts, have approved our Confession with all aforesaid articles, and appointed all the members of this church to adhere thereto; also ministers, elders, and entrants to the ministry, are bound to make solemn profession thereof, and subscribe the same; and parents at baptism are daily required to train up their children according to it.

Likewise the moderators of all our assemblies, at the close of every assembly, publicly asserted and declared before the king's high commissioner, that "as the assembly met in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, the only King and Head of his church, so they parted in the same name;" and also they named the diet of the next assembly. And when the commissioner dissolved the assembly 1692 abruptly, without naming a diet for another, the moderator did in his face, with consent of the whole assembly, remonstrate against, and declare, that "the office-bearers in the house of God have a spiritual intrinsic power from Jesus Christ, the only Head of his church, to meet in assemblies about the affairs thereof;" and he named a diet for another assembly. All this is recorded in the assembly's books. In like manner the assembly remonstrated, when dissolved in the year 1703. And the very next assembly 1704, in their answer to the queen's letter, plainly told her, that "they were now again met in a national assembly in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ." Also, they approved the several synod books through Scotland, which had assertory acts recorded in them, for Christ's Headship, the Divine right of Presbytery, the Church's Intrinsic Power, &c. To prevent which approbation, was the reason, as then generally believed, why the commissioner dissolved the preceding assembly. Again, the assembly 1705, in their 7th act concerning Mr. Hepburn, asserted in plain words, that "the Lord Jesus Christ is the alone King and Head of the church." And Assem. 1707, act 11, declare that "our Lord Jesus Christ hath instituted a government, and governors ecclesiastical in his house, with power to meet for the order and government thereof."

And as for the Divine right of Presbytery, the assembly 1711 expressly declared for it in their 10th act, when they appointed all entrants to the ministry, both when licensed and ordained, to subscribe and declare, not only that our Confession of Faith and purity of worship are founded upon the word of God, but also that "the Presbyterian government and discipline of this church are founded upon the word of God, and agreeable thereto;" and also solemnly to "engage that they will firmly and constantly adhere to the said doctrine and worship, and to the utmost of their power, in their station, assert, maintain, and defend the discipline and presbyterian government of this church, by kirk sessions, presbyteries, provincial synods, and general assemblies, during all the days of their lives." Whereby all ministers and preachers plainly renew our covenants. And that ministers in former years were of the same mind, appears by the church's declaration by their commission in the year 1698, published in their Seasonable Admonition, p. 5, in which they say, "We do believe and own that Jesus Christ is the only Head and King of the church: and that he hath instituted in his church, officers and ordinances, order and government, and not left it to the will of man, magistrate, or church, to alter at their pleasure. And we believe this government is neither prelatical nor congregational, but Presbyterian, which now, through the mercy of God, is established amongst us; and believe we have a better foundation for this our church-government than the inclination of the people, or laws of men," &c. And that commission's whole actings and conclusions were ratified and approved by Assem. 1699, act 12. Besides all which, our assemblies and commissions have frequently owned the obligation of our covenants, by mentioning the breaches of men among our causes of fasting. Assem. 1700, act 5, they lament "our continued unfaithfulness to God, notwithstanding of our solemn covenants and engagements to the contrary." Again, Assem. 1701, act 9, they say, "Our sins are the more aggravated, that they are against so many solemn repeated vows and engagements, and covenants with our God, which have been openly violated and broken by persons of all ranks, and treated with public contempt, indignities, and affronts," &c. We bless God, that has determined our church to own these truths so openly, over the belly of all their difficulties and discouragements; and we desire heartily to join with them in declaring for the "Headship of our Lord Jesus Christ" over his church, in opposition to the pope, magistrate, or any other; likewise for the "spiritual intrinsic power of the church" to choose her officers, meet in her judicatories, inflict censures, and govern the church, in opposition to all Erastian opinions or practices promoted by any party or person whatsoever; as also for the Divine right of Presbyterian government in the church, in opposition to prelacy, independency, &c., and for the lasting obligation of our covenants, seeing they bind us to nothing but what we are antecedently bound to by the scriptures of truth.

Thus the church of Scotland continued owning and adhering to her ancient principles and doctrines, and using means to promote religion through the land for many years after the revolution, without any visible declension. But, alas! her degeneracy and defection have of late years become too visible; and our union with England, in 1707, may be looked upon as the chief source thereof, next to the corruption of our hearts. When this transaction came to be laid before the Scottish parliament, in 1706, the nation was most intent about it, not knowing the nature or articles, whether it was a federal or incorporating union: but when it was seen to be the latter, and the majority of the house disposed to agree to it, both the church and the body of the people were vastly uneasy, great numbers of addresses came up against it, and insurrections were much feared. The commission by appointment sat during the whole session, and was exceeding numerous; members attending by turns. They presented three addresses to the parliament; the first was for "an unalterable security of the established religion, to the people of this land, and all succeeding generations, so far as human laws can go."

To satisfy them, the parliament enacted, That "the establishment of the doctrine, worship, discipline, and Presbyterian government of this church should be held as an unalterable, fundamental, and essential condition of the union of the two kingdoms," if concluded. This seemed to quiet many, reckoning the security of the church not so precarious and uncertain, when thus established by the mutual agreement of both parliaments in a solemn treaty of union, than when settled by acts of the Scottish parliament only; for the faith of the English in keeping treaties was at this time much spoken of. But the most part of the church continued still averse to an incorporating union, and their coming under the jurisdiction of a British parliament, in which the English members, being prelatical, would be ten to one of the Scottish members: wherefore the commission presented a second address, declaring this aversion. They indeed met with great opposition from noblemen and gentlemen, elders in the commission, who had views of temporal offices and advantages from court by being for the union: yet they represented the grievances the church and her members might fall under by the union, such as oaths, tests and impositions, inconsistent with their principles. And in their address they plainly testified against "the subjecting of this nation to a British parliament, in which twenty-six prelates would be constituent members and legislators: for, say they, it is contrary to our known principles and covenants, that any churchman should bear civil offices, or have power in the commonwealth." To this they got no answer, save a clause put in the act for securing the church, that "no oath, test, or subscription, shall ever be imposed within the bounds of this church and kingdom contrary to our Presbyterian establishment." By which, it is to be regretted, the parliament neither showed regard to the principles of Scotchmen when out of the kingdom, nor to the obligation of our covenants: nay, they proceeded to worse afterwards, by declaring that "the parliament of England might provide for the security of the church of England within the bounds of that kingdom, as they should think expedient;" whereby they consented to the securing of the prelacy and ceremonies of that church as a fundamental of the union. This being both against the word of God and our solemn league, we have cause to mourn over it as a national breach of covenant, in some respect; though it is a mercy the church was helped to remonstrate against it; for the commission, when informed of it, presently presented a third address, though greatly opposed, craving that "there might be no such stipulation or consent for the establishment of the hierarchy and ceremonies, as they would not involve themselves and the nation in guilt," &c. From all which it is evident, that this church remonstrated against making an union with England upon terms not consistent with our ancient covenant-union with that kingdom: for the ensuing assembly, 1707, approved the commission in what they did.

But, notwithstanding of the church's remonstrance against this union and the foresaid sinful stipulation, it was concluded and ratified by both parliaments; but it doth not appear that this memorable transaction has been followed with the special blessing of heaven, seeing it hath brought on very much sin, and many growing evils upon this poor land, to the dishonour of God, and decay of true Christianity among us. For, after the union, when our correspondence and communication with the English was greatly increased, the Lord's day began to be profaned after their example, and other immoralities much to abound, and the societies for reformation of manners to dwindle away. Likewise our nobility and gentry have been since that period giving up gradually with family-religion, and the very form of godliness, and falling into a looser way of living: for many of them since the union either dwell or spend much time in England, whereby they learn many of their vices and evil customs; they are either reconciled to the English hierarchy and worship, or live much in the neglect of all public worship; and, being there under the inspection of no parish minister, they and their families get leave to live as they list: and, when they come down to Scotland, they get many to follow their loose example.

Also, since the union, public oaths are prodigiously multiplied, in qualifying men for offices, in collecting and paying of taxes; and manifold prejudices are thereby committed, and particularly by custom-house oaths, and running of goods, which also opens a door to many other sins. And hereby atheism, deism, and infidelity, have made progress in the land.

Likewise, soon after the union, the English service and ceremonies were set up in several places, and afterwards the parliament gave a toleration for it, and the body of the Episcopal clergy embraced that worship, though their ancestors had always opposed it heretofore. Yea, by this law, almost all errors are tolerated; and now even the Popish worship is kept openly, and connived at. A superstitious form of swearing was soon introduced from England, by laying the hand on and kissing the gospels. The sacramental test, and conformity to the liturgy and ceremonies, is imposed upon the members of this church, while serving the king in England and Ireland. Likewise many other encroachments are made upon the government, rights, and privileges of this church, by the toleration act, and by the act for restoring patronages, by the act for a vacation of the lords of session, and other courts, in the end of December, whereby the keeping of holidays is encouraged; and, lastly, by refusing access to the house of peers, unless the address be directed to the lords spiritual. And all these grievances are brought upon us, notwithstanding of our security by the union act, and the English faith so much talked of. From all which we may conclude, That as our union with England was made upon sinful terms, so in the event it hath proved a great judgment upon this land and church. Alas! we have been perfidious to God, and no wonder though men should be left to be perfidious to us.

Very soon did Scotland feel the bitter effects of the union; for, in the view of its being concluded, several of the Episcopal clergy began to set up the English service in meeting-houses, hoping to find more countenance and support from England on this account. This way of worship was wholly new and strange, and could never find place in Scotland before. Wherefore, the general assembly, 1706, that met soon after the conclusion of the union, gave an honest testimony against this new worship, by their 15th act, intitled, Act against innovations in the worship of God; wherein they say, "the purity of divine worship, and uniformity therein, hath been the great happiness of this church ever since her reformation; and that the introduction of these innovations was not so much as once attempted, even during the late prelacy; that they are dangerous to this church, and manifestly contrary to our known principle," viz., That nothing is to be admitted in the worship of God, but what is prescribed in the holy scriptures: and that the assembly, moved with zeal for the glory of God, and the purity and uniformity of his worship, discharges the practice of all such innovations of divine worship within this church; and requires and obtests all the ministers of this church, especially those in whose bounds any such innovations are, or may happen to be, to represent to their people the evil thereof, and seriously to exhort them to beware of them, &c. And they appointed the commission to use all proper means for suppressing such innovations. Which the commission did, as appears by their act, 5th August, 1709, which they ordained to be read in all the churches through Scotland. But the more the church opposed this new worship, as they judged they were warranted to do by the laws of the land, the more forward were their enemies to set it up, and at length got the parliament to espouse their cause.

Likewise, soon after the union, gross profanation of the Lord's day began to abound, by travelling, carrying goods, driving cattle, and other abuses on that holy day; as appears from the 12th act of assembly, 1708. For preventing whereof, the assembly in that act appointed each presbytery to send some of their number to attend the lords of justiciary at their first circuit that falls to be in their bounds, and to represent to their lordships the profanation of the Lord's day, by the foresaid wicked and sinful practices. And the general assembly seriously recommended to the lords of justiciary to take an effectual course to restrain and punish the foresaid abuses; which, the assembly say, they will acknowledge as a singular service done to God and his church. Also they enjoin all ministers to represent to their people, among whom such practices are, the great hazard their immortal souls are in by such courses; and also to proceed not only with ecclesiastical censures against Sabbath-breakers, but also to apply to justices of peace, and other magistrates in their bounds, to execute the laws against them. But, our commerce with England still increasing, the profanation of the Lord's day among us is come to a great height, in spite of all the church hath done against it.

But, our sins and provocations against God being highly aggravated, as a just punishment upon us, God was pleased to let loose our enemies in the British parliament to bring in a bill, which they got passed into a law, for allowing those of the Episcopal clergy the use of the English liturgy in Scotland, containing some grievous clauses in it against the just and legal rights of the established church. While the bill was in dependence, March 1712, the commission met and addressed the queen, in which they gave free and faithful Testimony against the said bill, which the assembly that met in May 1712, unanimously approved; and, as a token of it, inserted their address in their books, and printed it with their acts. In it they say, "The church of Christ in Scotland is in hazard of sad alterations and innovations, inconsistent with, and contrary to, that happy establishment, secured to us by the laws both of God and the realm, by the said bill. If the matters in question only related to our own case and better accommodation, we should patiently bear the same: but when we see the glory of God, and the power and purity of our holy religion, and of the ordinances of Jesus Christ in this church, so much concerned, we cannot but hope that your majesty will allow us to plead our just right," &c. Afterwards they plead the several acts of parliament for settling and securing the worship, discipline, and government of this church, with her rights and privileges; all which acts were ratified by the parliaments of both kingdoms in the treaty of union, and declared to be a fundamental, essential, and unalterable condition of the said treaty of union in all time coming. It is observable, after their pleading the 5th act parl. 1690, which allows the Presbyterian ministers and elders to have power to try and purge out all insufficient, negligent, scandalous, and erroneous ministers, by due course of ecclesiastical process and censures, and likewise to redress all other church disorders: they add, By which act it is evident, that Presbyterian church-government being thus established, the ministers and elders of this church have all the powers committed by our Lord and Master to his ministers and officers, to watch over the flock, and to guard against all usurpers and intruders.

Afterwards they add, We cannot but express our astonishing surprise and deep affliction, to hear of such a bill, offered for such a large and almost boundless toleration, not only threatening the overthrow of this church, but giving a large licence almost to all errors and blasphemies, and throwing up all good discipline, to the dishonour of God, and the scandal and ruin of the true Christian religion, and the infallible disturbance of the quiet, and to the confusion of this church and nation. And therefore we in all humility, but with the greatest earnestness, beseech, nay, obtest your majesty, by the same mercy of God that restored this church, and raised your majesty to the throne, to interpose for the relief of this church, and the maintenance of the present establishment, against such a manifest and ruining encroachment.

The church being most earnest to oppose this toleration, and other grievances then coming upon the church, they sent three of their number, Messrs. Carstares, Blackwall, and Baillie, to London, to present this and others of their petitions, and to agent the church's cause: but, notwithstanding of all that, this and other acts were passed against the church; all Episcopal ministers were allowed to preach, pray, administer the sacraments, and marry, without any other caveat that appears for their doctrine, save that they shall not deny, in their preaching or writing, the doctrine of the blessed Trinity. They are not by that act obliged to satisfy the church, or any person or society, concerning their belief of the doctrine of the Trinity: it is enough if they do not openly impugn it: so that there is a liberty given to the most erroneous or scandalous men, to preach and dispense sacraments, without being accountable to any.

We here join with the church in testifying against such a boundless toleration, as being contrary to the word of God, and the practice of reforming magistrates and churches therein commended: as in 2 Chron. xxxiv. 33; Rev. ii. 2, and to those texts wherein such a toleration is reproved, as Rev. ii. 14, 15, 20, as also it is contrary to our Confession of Faith, chap. 23, and to our Larger Catechism, upon the second commandment.

At the same time there was another distressing bill presented in the parliament for restoring of patronages, and repealing the act 1690, which gave liberty to parishes to call their own ministers. This also carried against the church, notwithstanding of the commons' address, which was in like manner approved by the assembly. In this address they plead and assert, That "the act 1690, abolishing patronages, is a part of our Presbyterian constitution, ratified by the acts of parliament of both kingdoms in the treaty of union, and declared to be unalterable. That, from our first reformation from Popery, patronages have still been reckoned a yoke and burden upon this church; and this is declared by the first and second books of discipline: that the restoring of them will inevitably obstruct the work of the gospel, and create great disorders and disquiet in this church and nation; and that there is one known abuse attending patronages, viz. the laying a foundation for simoniacal pactions between patrons and those presented by them." Though this did not avail to stop the bill, yet it was a plain testimony from the church against patronages; which we cannot but approve and adhere to.

Likewise, we approve of that noble testimony which the general assembly gave against both the toleration and patronages, May 14, 1715, when they approved a memorial concerning them, which they appointed to be sent to the duke of Montrose, principal secretary of state, most humbly entreating him to lay it before the king, viz. king George I. The tenor of it is as follows:

"The church of Scotland being restored at the happy revolution, was, by the claim of right, and acts of parliament following thereupon, established in its doctrine, worship, discipline, and government; and, that this legal constitution and establishment might be unalterably secured, it was declared to be a fundamental and essential condition of the union, and accordingly ratified in the parliaments of both kingdoms. But the zeal of the established church of Scotland for, and their steady adherence to, the Protestant succession, exposed them to the resentments of a disaffected party. And now they account themselves aggrieved by some acts passed in the parliament of Great Britain; as, 1. By the act granting such a large and almost boundless toleration to those of the Episcopal persuasion in Scotland, while the liberty allowed to Protestant dissenters in England, who had always given the most satisfying proofs of their undoubted zeal and good affection to the Protestant succession, was retrenched. And though the church of Scotland had an equal security in a legal establishment with that of England, yet there is a vast inequality as to the toleration of the respective dissenters. In Scotland the toleration doth not restrain the disseminating the most dangerous errors, by requiring a Confession of Faith, or subscription to the doctrinal articles of the established church, as is required of dissenters in England: it also weakeneth the discipline of the church against the scandalous and profane; by withdrawing the concurrence of the civil magistrate. It is also an inequality and hardship upon the established church of Scotland, that those of her communion who are employed in his majesty's service in England or Ireland, should be obliged to join in communion and conformity to the church of England; whereas conformity to this church is not required, nor do we plead that it should be, of members of the church of England, when called to serve his majesty in Scotland, who here enjoy the full liberty of dissenters without molestation; and the common and equal privileges of the subjects of the united kingdom, stipulated by the union, claim the same liberty to the members of the church of Scotland, when employed in his majesty's service in England or Ireland.

"2. By the act restoring the power of presentation to patrons, the legal established constitution of this church was altered in a very important point; and while it appears equitable in itself, and agreeable to the liberty of Christians and a free people, to have interest in the choice of those to whom they intrust the care of their souls, it is an hardship to be imposed upon in so tender a point, and that frequently by patrons who have no property or residence in the parishes; and this besides the snares of simoniacal pactions, and the many troubles and contests arising from the power of patronages, and the abuses thereof, by disaffected patrons putting their power into other hands, who as effectually serve their purposes: by patrons competing for the right of presentation in the same parish; and by frequently presenting ministers settled in eminent posts to mean and small parishes, to elude the planting thereof: by all which, parishes are kept long vacant, to the great hindrance of the progress of the gospel."

Although the church of Scotland was brought under distress enough by the toleration and patronages, yet, to add to it, the oath of abjuration was also imposed upon the ministers thereof in the year 1712. This occasioned a great question among them, and much writing upon it, whether the conditions or qualifications required of the successor to the crown, in the acts of parliament settling the succession, of which this is one, that "he must join in communion with the church of England," be understood as any part of the oath, or not? Those who were not clear to take it, apprehended these conditions might be reckoned a part of the oath, because in it they were to swear to maintain the succession as entailed by the acts of parliament, in which these conditions were contained. Others again understood these conditions as no part of the oath, seeing when the oath was first framed in the English parliament, in the year 1701, and a clause was offered to be added to it for maintaining the church of England, it was rejected, because the dissenters could not take it; and, at the union, the parliament had expressly exempted these of this church from all oaths inconsistent with their principles: and consequently, that the as in the oath was not reduplicative upon the qualifications of the successor, but merely indicative, as only pointing out the acts wherein the succession was settled, and the illustrious family and persons on whom it was entailed failing the heirs of king William, queen Anne, and her heirs, &c. And therefore they understood that the oath brought them under no other obligation, but of allegiance to the sovereign, and to an engagement against a Popish pretender, and to the succession in the Protestant line: and to prevent mistakes and misrepresentations they might be liable to in this matter, they resolved to give in written declarations to this purpose upon instrument, at taking of the oath, which generally they did. At this time the commission addressed the queen, as also did the assembly, in favour of those who still scrupled at the oath, as if the as in it some way referred to the conditions required of the successor, that such might be favourably dealt with, as her loyal subjects. As also they petitioned her, that their declarations of loyalty to the queen, their renouncing the pretender, and engagements to support the succession to the crown in the Protestant line in the family of Hanover, as contained in their address, might be accepted by her as their sense of the said oath, without respect to the condition scrupled at. In answer thereto, the queen, in her letter to the assembly, declared that the address of the commission so much manifested their loyalty to her, and their true concern for the succession in the Protestant line by law established, that it could not but be acceptable. This answer very much confirmed those who judged that the as in the oath did not reduplicate upon the qualifications of the successor, and gave freedom to many to take it.

After king George I. came to the throne, and understood our difficulties, by the representation of assembly 1715, and former addresses, he interposed for the relief of those who scrupled at the oath, and got the parliament to turn the as into which, as also to declare that the oath was not meant to oblige his majesty's subjects in Scotland to any thing inconsistent with their church establishment according to law. This removed the scruples of many; but nevertheless there were not a few worthy ministers who remained uneasy and scrupulous, upon account there was still mention made in the oath of the act of parliament that required the conditions of the successor, and therefore wanted to have it wholly taken out of the oath. Which, upon application, the king was so good as to grant, by act of parliament, in the fifth year of his reign. This did the Lord in his merey settle the great commotions that were in the church by reason of that oath, and extricated her out of some of her difficulties; yea, so far, that the most strict and zealous ministers in Scotland were brought to declare, both from the pulpit and in the press, that the embracing or refusing the oath of abjuration did not afford the least ground for separation.

It is remarkable, that, in the midst of all these grievances and pressures which the church groaned under, the Lord did not suffer her to sink. The times indeed became very cloudy and dark; the church's friends were turned out of place, and her enemies were exalted in power; Jacobites were put in places of highest trust, and many of them became so insolent, as to maltreat and abuse the ministers of the gospel, and sometimes to cause burn at market-crosses the acts of synods for fasts, because in them they appointed prayers to be made for maintaining the Protestant succession, and for defeating the designs and plots then forming for overturning it, and for bringing in a Popish pretender. Yet even then the Lord inspired the commission with courage and resolution to emit their famous seasonable warning, at their meeting, 19th August, 1713, which was read from the pulpits; wherein they obtest all Protestants and lovers of their country to look to themselves, that they be not deluded by the subtle devices of a Jacobite party, who would bring us under the yoke of a Popish pretender. Here the commission mention their articles at large; one whereof is, "They, with great appearance of zeal, espouse and promote the English liturgy through the land, though neither they nor their fathers would receive it heretofore; and at the same time they omit all the prayers for queen Anne and princess Sophia. Likewise they make a great outcry, especially in distant places, of their having suffered grievous persecutions because of their being of the Episcopal persuasion, though without ground. Blessed be God, say they, we can appeal to the consciences of all who know our conduct, that we have never, since the late happy revolution, in the least returned the severities, and unparalleled cruelties, which we met with when they had the ascendant; and which we from their present temper, as well as from their former behaviour, may reasonably conclude they want nothing but power to renew against the ministers and members of this church. Wherefore they seriously obtest and beseech all ranks of persons to humble themselves deeply under the many sad causes and tokens of the Lord's anger, and turn to him with all their hearts, and flee to the blood of sprinkling for reconciliation, and pray earnestly to God to disappoint the designs and hopes of a Popish and Jacobite party, preserve the Protestant succession in the house of Hanover, sanctify the troubles which have afflicted our Zion, and turn us from all these which have procured them," &c.

And glory be to a prayer-hearing God, who soon blasted all the Jacobites' plots and hopes, and made the Protestant succession take place, by the accession of king George I. within less than a year, to the joy of this poor oppressed church, and of all true Protestants.

Towards the end of the queen's reign the Jacobites turned so courageous, that they encouraged Episcopal ministers to intrude into vacant churches, and ministers and preachers, who were sent to preach in them, were rabbled. They and their preachers publicly solemnized the pretender's birthday, set up bonfires, drank his health as king before great multitudes, and confusion to all the Presbyterians. But upon the accession of king George I., these riots and insults were suppressed, and the laws and good order began again to take place. The church represented her grievances from the laws lately made; but the breaking out of the rebellion, in 1715, put a stop to designs of that sort for a time. Until then, there were a good number of Episcopal ministers continued in churches through the North; but they, joining with others in that rebellion, were soon afterwards turned out. The Lord was pleased again to pity us, and work a great deliverance for us: for though the Jacobite and Popish party rose of a sudden, and gathered together in great numbers, threatening to carry all before them, to cut off our sovereign king George, and all the friends of the Protestant succession, attacked the king's forces, and killed many; yet the Lord soon brake all their measures, poured shame upon their attempt, and made many of them flee their native country: so that in a wonderful manner God delivered us from the bloody sword, and the cruel designs of Papists and Jacobites, and restored peace in all our borders, in the year 1716.

It might have been expected, that such astonishing mercies and deliverances would have produced humility and thankfulness to God, have led us to repentance and reformation, and have animated our zeal for God and his truths, and our activity to get the church's grievances redressed, when such a fit opportunity seemed to offer. But, alas! we became unthankful to God, and soon forgot his goodness; we turned secure and confident under king George's protection and favour, and began to lose that zeal for preserving the purity of doctrine and worship, for suppressing error and immorality, and for the advancement of religion and godliness, which former assemblies manifested. Now our old zealous suffering ministers were generally gone off the stage, and a woful lukewarmness and indifferency began to seize upon the following generation.

At this time there was a great noise of Mr. John Simson, professor of divinity at Glasgow, venting and teaching Arminian doctrine and gross errors. The worthy Mr. James Webster, one of the ministers of Edinburgh, having conversed with him thereupon, was the first that complained of him: and he was therefore appointed to process him before the presbytery of Glasgow; though it seems hard that Mr. Webster should have been burdened with an affair which was the common cause of the church. But Mr. Webster's appeal, the libel he gave against Mr. Simson, and Mr. Simson's answer thereto, came before the assembly, 1716, who remitted the same to a committee to consider the whole process, and to make a full and distinct report to the next assembly. In Mr. Simson's answer to this libel, and his letters to Mr. Rowan, there were found several very dangerous errors, contrary to the word of God, and our Confession of Faith and Catechisms; such as, "That there is nothing to be admitted in religion, but what is consonant to reason. That regard to our own happiness, in the enjoyment of God, ought to be our chief motive in serving him; and that our glorifying God is subordinate to it. That the heathen may know, by the light of nature, that there is a remedy for sin provided; and if they would pray sincerely for the discovery of the way of salvation, God would grant it to them. That if men would with diligence, sincerity, and faith, use the means for obtaining saving grace, God has promised to grant it; and that the using of the means in the foresaid manner is not above the reach of our natural powers. That there was no proper covenant made with Adam for himself and his posterity; and that he was not our federal head. That it is inconsistent with God's justice and goodness to create souls wanting original righteousness; and that the souls of infants since the fall are created pure and holy. That it is probable there are more of mankind saved than damned: and it is more than probable that baptized infants, dying in infancy, are all saved. That there is no sinning in hell after the last judgment," &c. All which erroneous scheme of doctrine is fully refuted and exposed by the Rev. Mr. John Flint and Mr. John McClaren, both ministers of Edinburgh, in two different books, the one written in Latin and the other in English, to which Mr. Simson never offered any reply. Mr. Simson when before the assembly and their committee, declared his adherence to our Confession of Faith, and studied to put sense upon his doctrine to make it seem to agree therewith, and made use of very subtile distinctions for that end; but such hath been the zeal sometimes of our assemblies against error, and for purity of doctrine, that they would have had no great difficulty to have agreed that Mr. Simson, or any man that vented or taught such doctrine as above, was not fit to be continued a professor of divinity, to instruct and train up young men for the holy ministry. But when his process came to be finished by assembly, 1717, there were so many members in it who either had been his scholars, or were his relations, comrades, or acquaintances, who stood up for saving him, that the assembly were brought to dismiss him with a very gentle censure, by their 9th act; wherein they only say, "He hath given offence, and hath vented some opinions not necessary to be taught in divinity, and that hath given more occasion to strife, than to the promoting of edification: that he hath used some expressions that bear and are used by adversaries in a bad and unsound sense, though he doth disown that unsound sense. And for answering more satisfiably, as he supposeth, the cavils and objections of adversaries, he hath adopted some hypotheses different from what are commonly used among orthodox divines, that are not evidently founded on scripture, and tend to attribute too much to natural reason, and the power of corrupt nature; which undue advancement of reason and nature is always to the disparagement of revelation and efficacious free grace. The general assembly, for the reasons above mentioned, prohibits and discharges the said Mr. John Simson to use such expressions, or to teach, preach, or otherwise vent such opinions, propositions, or hypotheses as aforesaid." But as a just rebuke upon the assembly for their lenity, Mr. Simson persisted in his unsound doctrine, contemned their sentence, and still went on in a course of error, till in a few years he is arraigned before the assembly for Arianism.

About this time there arose debates and great noise, as if some ministers were bringing in a new scheme of doctrine, because in their sermons they disused and censured several old approved words and phrases as too legal, and affected some new modes of speaking; and because they recommended to their people an old book called the "Marrow of Modern Divinity." This book was laid before the assembly, 1720, as containing gross Antinomian errors; and several passages and propositions being excerpted from it by a committee, the assembly proceeded in a hurry to pass a condemnatory act against them all in cumulo; and, among the rest, they condemned as erroneous two propositions, viz., "That believers are altogether set free from the law as a covenant of works; and that they are set free both from the commanding and condemning power of the covenant of works." Which two are surely sound and orthodox propositions in themselves. Likewise that same assembly, by another act, recommended to ministers to insist in preaching several doctrines, and among others, "the necessity of a holy life, in order to the obtaining of everlasting happiness." This certainly was very ill worded, however sound their meaning was.

Although there were several stumbling and unjustifiable expressions in that book called the Marrow, &c., yet, before the assembly had proceeded to pass their acts concerning them, it had been their wisdom to have first remitted them, as in other cases, to the consideration of presbyteries; which happy step would have prevented the oversights or mistakes of the assembly aforementioned, and consequently the twelve brethren's representation against the foresaid act, given in to the assembly, 1721, which was once likely to have landed in a schism. But it must be owned, that, when the assembly, 1722, came to review and explain these hasty acts past in 1720, they did justice to truth, and declared their minds, concerning the acts and propositions quarrelled, in very sound and orthodox terms. And particularly, as to "the necessity of holiness for obtaining everlasting happiness," they declare the expression is meant of "obtaining the enjoyment and possession of everlasting happiness," but not of "the right and title to it," which, they say, all justified persons have already attained, viz., through the imputation of the righteousness of Jesus Christ. Thus peace and truth were preserved in the church at that time.

No doubt it had been much for the interest of truth, as well as the honour of our assemblies, that they had manifested as much zeal against other erroneous books, which have been published or recommended before or since that time by other ministers of this church, and some of them far more dangerous than the Marrow, such as Dr. Whitecot's Sermons, &c. Oh that our ancient and true zeal for truth and purity, and against all kind of error and corruption, were again happily revived in the land! But, alas! how little ground have we in an ordinary way to expect any national reviving or reformation in the church and land, while the floodgates of error and corruption are still kept wide open by the laws for the toleration and patronages!

In consequence of applications to the king by the church, some amendments were made upon these laws by the parliament in 1719: as, 1. They discharged any person to preach or pray in any Episcopal meeting-house in Scotland, that did not pray for king George, and take the abjuration oath, under the pain of six months imprisonment, and having the meeting-house shut up. This act, had it been executed, would have put a stop to many of the erroneous Jacobite preachers; but not being executed against them, they still went on in disseminating many Popish errors through the land.

2. The parliament enacted, That presentations given by patrons to vacant churches shall be of no effect, if the person presented do not accept or declare his willingness to accept of the presentation given him. By which act, the parliament put it, as it were, in the church's power, to ease herself of the great grievance of patronage; which was ground of joy to many: for, at that time it was generally thought that this limitation was equivalent to plain repealing of the patronage act, and that no Presbyterian would ever expressly declare his accepting of a presentation, or go so far to approve or comply with patronage, which Presbyterians had always declared a heavy yoke and burden on the church of God. And accordingly there was no man that presumed to take, accept, or make use of, a presentation to a church for several years after this act was passed; and so the church was easy, and continued to settle vacant churches upon the call of congregations, without any molestation from patrons.

During this lucid interval, the church seemed to turn secure, as if she feared no danger from the acceptance of presentations; and therefore was at no pains to shut or bar the door against such acceptances. Had this been done, the church was effectually delivered by the foresaid favourable act from the yoke of patronage. Now was the proper juncture for our assemblies to have made a new declaration, in corroboration of what former assemblies had done, concerning the woful corruption and evil consequences of patronage; and to have warned all the members of this church of the evil of encouraging or promoting the same, and particularly all ministers and preachers, of the sin and danger of complying with this corruption, by accepting of presentations; especially seeing there was no law requiring it as necessary, but, by the late act of parliament, an open door was left for their entering into churches in a gospel-way, if they pleased to choose and accept of it. No doubt, if things had been set in such clear light by our general assemblies, the authority of the church would have restrained these woful acceptances. But, alas! while the church slept, the enemy was busy sowing his tares, and prompting some to devise subtle conditional acceptances, wherein they might disapprove of patronages, and declare for Presbyterian principles with respect to the people's rights: yet, in the mean time, take such hold of the stipend presented to, that another could not make a legal title to it. When this was complained of to superior judicatories, some leading men, alas! were found to patronise these accepters, till at length they proceeded to the most open and barefaced acceptances. For these practices, indeed, some preachers were censured and silenced, but they were reposed by superior courts; whereby at length acceptances went on without controul. So that, by such defections, the yoke of patronage is faster wreathed upon the church than ever, and her condition under it more lamentable than in any former period: for in former times all honest men groaned under patronage as a burden; and though they were presented by patrons to churches, yet they neither said nor wrote any thing in favour of the patron's deed, but silently submitted the presbyteries proceeding to their settlement, when they had the parishes concurring in it: but, alas! by such active written acceptances as are now in use, the whole church shall, in process of time, be involved in approving of patronages, in such a way as was never done by the church of Scotland since the reformation.

Wherefore we judge it the duty of all the lovers of truth and purity in the church of God, to bear open testimony against the yoke of patronage, and the acceptance of presentations, as we hereby desire to do, especially seeing they have been productive of such dreadful evils in this church of late years.

It is well known, that the church of Scotland hath, ever since her reformation, remonstrated against patronages, and asserts in her second book of discipline, chap. 12, that patronages have flowed from the pope, and the corruption of the canon law: and the intruding of persons this way into churches, hath no ground in the word of God, but is contrary thereto, &c. Likewise the parliament, 1649, in their act abolishing patronage, say, It is an evil and bondage under which the Lord's people and ministers have long groaned; and that it is a custom popish, brought into the church in times of ignorance and superstition; and that it is contrary to the second book of discipline, &c. Also the assemblies, 1712 and 1715, gave plain testimonies against patronages to the same purpose, and assert, that they lay a foundation for simoniacal pactions, and many other evils. To these testimonies we adhere, and likewise will add some further reasons against patronages:

1. Patronages are neither agreeable to the rules of God's word, nor to the apostolical practice: seeing it is evident from the word, that it was only the church herself, with her officers, that exercised the power of nominating and electing ministers and officers to the church, according to the authority derived to them from Christ their Head and Founder, Acts i. 15; vi. 2; viii. 14; xiii. 3; xiv. 23; xvi. 9; 1 John iv. 1; 2 John x. So that a patron's right of nominating the officers of the church, is nothing but a manifest usurpation over the church of God.

2. Patronage is also contrary to the practice of the primitive and purest ages of the church, and was not known in the church until true religion and Christianity began to decline, and then it came in gradually with other Popish corruptions and abuses. We find Cyprian, Athanasius, the Apostolical Constitutions, with many ancient councils and fathers, declaring in the plainest terms for the free liberty and power of the church to choose her own pastors, without any extrinsic influence whatsoever.

3. As it is disagreeable to scripture and antiquity, so it is contrary to reason, and to the interest and safety of the church, that the power of choosing her own pastors should at any time be lodged in the hands of heretics and profane men, as frequently the right of patronage is, being conveyed to them with their earthly inheritances. Can there be any thing more unreasonable or more absurd, than that the power of choosing officers to the church, should fall into the hands of the declared enemies of the church! or that this power, which is a spiritual and ecclesiastical privilege, should be conveyed, disposed, sold, or bought with money, like other civil rights or heritages, and so be lodged frequently with infidels and the worst of men.

4. For patrons to impose ministers upon Christian congregations, is a plain encroachment upon the natural rights of mankind, and upon the laws of free societies; as much as it would be for them to impose physicians and lawyers upon societies, to take care of their bodies or estates. The churches of Christ are as free societies as any in the world, having their liberties from Christ to choose their own pastors; and ought not to be brought in bondage to any in this matter.

5. It is a cruel imposition to oblige societies of men, who duly value their immortal souls, and would place them under proper spiritual guides, to entrust the edification, comfort, and eternal concerns of these precious souls, to the care of patrons; many whereof are indifferent about the concerns of their own souls, being negligent, erroneous, or profane; and so are not like to be much concerned to choose proper pastors to take inspection of the souls of others. How can serious Christians be easy who it be that choose their pastors, or those who know that patrons cannot secure them against the bad consequences of a wrong choice, nor be responsible for their souls at the great day?

Lastly, Patronage, by long experience, has been found to be an open door for a corrupt ministry to enter into the church: and this is sadly exemplified in those churches where this corruption reigns without control.

Upon all which accounts, we judge it our duty to bear testimony against the usurpation of patronage, as most sinful in itself, and injurious to the church of God; and to pray that God may open the eyes of all patrons, that they may be convinced and repent of it, and cease from oppressing Christ's church any more.

And as we bear testimony against patrons and their usurpation, so we judge ourselves bound to testify against all those who encourage and voluntarily comply with this sinful usurpation, and particularly by accepting or declaring their willingness to accept of presentations from patrons, which, alas! is now become the common practice; and, being so common and general, both preachers and people are like to lose all sense of the evil of it. But that these acceptances are sinful, and provoking to a holy God, is evident from these considerations:

1. If a patron be guilty of a sinful usurpation over the church of God, in spoiling her of the right she hath from Christ to choose her own officers, as certainly he is, then the acceptor of a presentation becomes partner with the patron in his sin, by homologating his usurped power, and strengthening him in it. Now, the scripture expressly forbids us to be "partakers of other men's sins."

2. As the law now stands, the acceptor is more guilty of robbing the church of her right than the patron is; for the legislature have been so tender of the church by their act, 1719, as to put it absolutely in the power of ministers and preachers to accept or reject the usurpation of patronage as they please; so that a patron can give no trouble to the church, if he be not encouraged and assisted in it by an acceptor. His presentation would be but like a dead serpent, altogether lifeless and harmless to the church, if an acceptor did not come and inspire it with life, and put a sting in it. Though patronage be a grievous usurpation and burden on the church, yet it is now so limited and tied up in Scotland by law, that the church would not feel the burden of it, if it were not pulled down upon her by accepting presentees; so that now the acceptors are properly the oppressors of the church of Christ. If Christ condemns the Pharisees for "binding heavy burdens, grievous to be borne, and laying them upon other men's shoulders;" how condemnable must acceptors of presentations be, who bind such a grievous burden as patronage on the shoulders of Christ's church?

3. The minister or preacher who accepts of a presentation, not only brings sin upon himself, by oppressing the church, and spoiling her of her just right; but also takes the ready way to encourage and harden a patron in his guilt and sinful usurpation; and to obstruct his conviction, repentance, and reformation: for he will readily think that his conscience needs not be more strait-laced than theirs, who should inform him. Wherefore we earnestly wish and pray, that God would bring acceptors, with their advisers and supporters, calmly to consider what a sinful hand they have in ensnaring patrons in a corrupt course, and in hardening them in their usurpation over the church of God.

4. The way of accepting presentations opens a door to many sad evils, such as simoniacal pactions and intrigues, unchristian contentions and divisions in judicatories, oppressive concussions in parishes, vexatious prosecutions and appeals, and many scandalous intrusions into churches, to the great discredit of religion, and reproach of the ministerial character: hereby congregations are robbed of their just rights to call their own ministers, and very often Christ's flock is scattered and broken in pieces, the godly are grieved, and the wicked hardened: hereby ordinances come to be neglected, the Lord's day profaned, ignorance and vice encouraged, church-discipline weakened. Yea, this pernicious practice has given occasion to many violent settlements, and to a woful schism in the church, to the deposing of several worthy ministers, and to the discouragement of many pious students and preachers from serving the church: so that our acceptors have need to consider how they will answer for all these direful consequences of their practice, and whether the commonness of it will excuse the sinfulness of it. O that we could look to God, who only can open their eyes!

5. Acceptors of presentations act contrary to the known principles of Presbyterians, and to their own engagements; and so are chargeable with sad defection and breach of faith. Our second book of discipline, which is sworn to in our national covenant, declares patronages to be contrary to the word of God, chap. 12. And it was the general opinion in the year 1719, that accepting of presentations was inconsistent with Presbyterian principles, and with the rights and rules of this church, which all ministers and preachers oblige themselves to maintain; upon which account, none ventured to meddle with them for a good many years thereafter. In our opinion, they act contrary to their engagements which they come under by the assembly's formula, 1711; wherein they subscribe and promise, that they will never, directly or indirectly, endeavour the prejudice or subversion of the discipline and government of this church, but that they will, to the utmost of their power, maintain and support the same. Now, it was still reckoned a branch of our discipline and government, for parishes to have the liberty of free elections, and for Presbyteries to have access to free moderations in the calling of ministers. And it is visible to all, that accepters of presentations stop and hinder this free liberty and access, contrary to their engagements by the formula, and also by the national covenant.

6. Seeing it is notorious that the design of accepting presentations is to secure the stipend to the presentee, so as another cannot have a title to it; it is plain that the accepter hereby averts the order which Christ hath appointed in his church, viz., that a minister's right to maintenance should be consequential to his ordination to the ministry; whereas, by the method he takes, he would make a minister's ordination to the ministry consequential to his having a right to the maintenance; which is contrary to Christ's stated order, and the nature of things.

7. By accepting presentations, ministers sadly prejudice the success of the gospel and their own ministry, by offending and stumbling the parishes concerned, besides many others, at their conduct. And is it any wonder though a parish be offended with a man for going about to secure a title to their stipend, before they have access to know him, or show any inclination for him; and for his binding the yoke of patronage upon them, and spoiling them of their just right of choosing their own pastor; and for hindering them to get another worthy pastor whom they dearly love? What must they think of a man that tells a reclaiming parish, by word or deed, "I will be your minister in spite of your teeth, I will have the charge of your souls whether you will or not; and, if you refuse ordinances and means of salvation from me, you shall have none. Nay, come of your souls what will, though they should perish in a state of ignorance and prejudice, I will possess the kirk, manse, and benefice, and hold out another minister from you?" Have they not too good ground to suspect such a man of earthly-mindedness, greed of filthy lucre, or of being more concerned for "his own things than for the things of Jesus Christ," and the salvation of their souls? Which apprehensions are sufficient to stuff the breasts of people with prejudice against him at his entry, and to blast his ministrations to them for many years thereafter. For it is no wonder if they think such language or practices is not like that of one who sincerely designs to advance Christ's kingdom, and win souls to him, as a faithful minister ought to do; but rather of one that hath base worldly ends in view! The language of a pastor, whom Christ sends, is that in 2 Cor. xii. 14, "I seek not yours, but you;" whereas that of an accepter seems to be the very reverse, "I seek not you, but yours."

8. It increaseth the prejudice of many against such accepters, when they see there is no necessity for their accepting of presentations. Indeed, if there were no coming to a church or stipend but by the patron's right, something might be said to alleviate the crime: but at present there is no necessity from the law to accept of them; nay, on the contrary, the law leaves an open door, by which ministers and preachers may have an orderly gospel-access both to churches and benefices, without having any dealing with patrons at all, if they would but exercise a little patience till six months elapse. Now, how can people think charitably of those who refuse to enter by the safe gospel-door, and choose rather to climb up by the window of presentations and violence, when they cannot but see their so doing tends to blast their own ministry, and bring a heavy yoke on their mother-church, after she was in effect freed of it by the tenderness of the legislature in 1719? Now, seeing these acceptances were unnecessary and of most pernicious consequence to the church and the interests of the gospel, it cannot but be surprising that our general assemblies were at so little pains to discourage or prevent them, when it might have been easily done at the beginning. We find indeed that the assembly, 1724, referred it to their commission, to think of and overture thereanent, and lay it before the next assembly; but it doth not appear that there was any more done, notwithstanding of repeated instructions from presbyteries concerning the same. We know no reason can be assigned for the assembly's indolence in this matter, but their pusillanimity, or sinfulness of offending the government; but this fear of man hath brought a woful snare upon the poor church. Several synods indeed showed a willingness to restrain these acceptances; but presentees knowing where to have recourse, their acts were soon disregarded. At first one or two probationers began to aim at accepting presentations, but the outcry against them was so great, that they soon retracted, and passed from them again. But some time after, when principal George Chalmers adventured to accept a presentation to the church of Old Machar, several young men took courage and followed his example; and though at first they qualified their acceptances with having the people's consent, yet they would not retract them after the people showed their aversion to them; which occasioned many intrusions and violent settlements through several places of the church, contrary to our own principles. These intrusions came gradually into the church, but were not commonly practised, nor countenanced by superior courts, till after the year 1728. For we find the assembly, 1725, after a great struggle about calling a minister to Aberdeen, appointing, that besides the voting of magistrates, town-council, and elders, in the call, the inclinations of heads of families shall be consulted about it. And the assembly, 1726, censured the commission for proposing to proceeding to transport Mr. James Chalmers from Dyke to Aberdeen, without having due regard to the inclinations of the people of that city, who opposed his call. But, alas! our assemblies did not continue long in such a disposition; for they and their commission began soon afterwards to pay more regard to patrons and heritors in planting of churches, though few of these were hearers, than they did to the whole body of the people that attended ordinances. The crown having the patronage of most of the churches of Scotland, this melancholy turn of affairs was thought to be brought about by strong court-influence, and by the activity of several leading ministers, who had their dependence upon or expectations from that quarter. These began to vent themselves in judicatories against the rights of the Christian people, and to assert that there were no stated rules nor directions in scripture about the calling of ministers, or who should be the electors. Some of them wrote pamphlets against the people's rights, pretending to answer the scripture-arguments for them; and maintained that the clergy or judicatories were the proper electors. These were sufficiently answered by Mr. Currie, Mr. Hill, and others; but their opponents had the ascendant in judicatories, and carried things there as they pleased.

At this time the church of Scotland was in a most lamentable condition, and the wrath of the Almighty seemed to be kindled against her, in letting loose many adversaries at once to attack and destroy her: for at the same time we find her many ways dreadfully tossed and shaken: as by patronages, and intrusions pushed on by the court and great men; by independent schemes and constitutions of churches, zealously promoted by Mr. Glass and Mr. Archibald; by Arian errors taught and propagated by professor Sinson; by many gross errors vented by others, both Presbyterian and Episcopal; and by legal sermons and moral harangues, to the neglect of preaching Christ, introduced by many of the young clergy. All these evils, working and fermenting through the land at once, occasioned dreadful shocks and convulsions in this national church, likely to rend her in many pieces. Yet, alas! we were not sensible of, nor suitably affected with our danger and misery, nor with the sins which were the procuring cause of all. "Turn us, O God of our salvation, and cause thine anger towards us to cease! O, wilt thou be angry with us for ever? wilt thou draw out thine anger to all generations?" Whatever the Lord think fit to do with this backsliding church and land, we judge it incumbent upon us to bear witness against the foresaid evils.

As to the impugning and invading the rights which congregations have to choose and call their own ministers, and the intrusions made upon them, which, alas! still continue to be practised; we shall give our reasons for testifying against them, and for the rights of the people. And the first and great reason is, because, by the rule and pattern of God's word, and by the dictates of sound and sober reason, the Christian people have an unquestionable interest in the choice of these pastors to whom they are to intrust the care of their souls: and particularly, this right of the people is established by several passages of the "Acts of the Apostles," a book intended to give us the apostolical practice and pattern in the settlement of the Christian church.

1. In Acts i. 13—15, &c., when the eleven apostles met for the choice of an apostle, the laity present with them were allowed a share in the election of two, of which God chose one to fill the vacancy of the apostolical college. From which we infer, That ministers should much more consult them in the choice of ordinary pastors, who are to have the stated inspection of their souls; and that this condescension of the apostles to the people in this case, condemns their practice who violently impose ministers upon Christian congregations, while they are dissenting and reclaiming against them, and willing to receive others every way as fit for them. And we find our reformers and Protestant divines, such as Calvin, Beza, Junius, Zanchy, Chamier, Voetius, Amesius, Turretine, Cartwright, Calderwood, Gillespie, Forrester, Lauder, and many others, improving this passage for the people's rights against papists, prelatists, and patronages.

2. In Acts vi. the apostles called the multitude or body of the disciples to the choice of the first standing church officers which they appointed, viz. the deacons for taking care of the poor; from which we infer, If the disciples have a right to choose these officers who are to dispose of their charity, then much more those who are to oversee their souls. And if the apostles reckoned the people competent to judge who had the qualifications for deacons which they prescribe, viz., "who were most eminent for honesty, wisdom, and the gifts of the Holy Ghost; why are they not competent to give their judgment of the like qualifications in those who are to be their pastors? The apostles, being under immediate divine direction, were abundantly capable to choose these officers without the people; yet they will needs have them concurring in it, as a patron to the church in their after choosing of church officers. And it is observable, the apostles took this method to silence the complaints among the people about providing for the poor. Which loudly call upon judicatories with us to follow their example, in order to silence the people's complaints of violent intrusions made upon them, contrary to the apostles' practice and our acknowledged principles, to the great hindrance of the gospel and the edification of souls. Likewise we have the forecited Protestant divines concurring to improve this passage of the deacons for the people's rights: and it might be expected that the ministers of the church of Scotland would not oppose them, or join with the papists in this question.

3. The apostles' practice in the election of church-officers, being sufficiently evident by the foresaid two instances, the sacred penman of the Acts insists no more upon this subject, save that he hints at their known practice in ordinations, Acts xiv. 23. In our version it is, "And when they had ordained them elders in every church." Now, the word here rendered ordained, is but half translated; for in the original it is χειροτονήσαντες, which Erasmus renders cum suffragiis creassent; and Beza, agreeing with him, hath it per suffragia creassent: so that according to these learned men, and many others, the passage should have been rendered, "When they had by suffrages appointed to them elders in every church." So it is in all old English translations, and so it was brought in by our last translators, until the version was committed by king James to some of the English bishops to be revised, who altered no less than fourteen passages of the New Testament, and this among the rest, to make them speak the language of the church of England; but the original language, being that of the Holy Ghost, is to be our rule. The word here is not χειροθεσία, which signifies action of ministers in ordaining; but it is χειροτομία, which is expressive of the people's act in electing of pastors, by stretchling or lifting up the hand, as was the custom: and in this senso doth the apostle make use of the word χειροτομία, and ascribe it to the people, 2 Cor. viii. 19.

4. The spoiling congregations of their right of calling their ministers, and imposing pastors upon them, is not only against the example of the apostles, but also contrary to the commands of our glorious Head, to our own prayers, and to the very spirit of the gospel. Doth not Christ enjoin us in his word to "glorify him in all things," to "do all to the glory of God," and to "do all things to the edification of his people?" to "condescend to men of low estate," and to "be gentle towards all men?" Doth he not forbid us to "exercise dominion over the church," to "set at nought our brother, and rule over his people with rigour?" doth he not command all Christians to "judge of what they hear," to "try the spirits," to "beware of false prophets?" Are not all ministers and others bound to pray, that "God's name may be hallowed," that "his kingdom may come," and that "the whole earth may be filled with his glory?" And do not they act the very reverse of these commands and prayers, who would in a magisterial way intrude ministers upon Christian congregations, and thereby stop the spreading of his gospel, the conversion of souls, and the increase of his kingdom upon earth? Are forced settlements agreeable to the meekness and gentleness of Christ our Master and Pattern? Or are they like the mild disposition and condescensions of the apostle Paul, who used the most tender, soft, and condescending methods to advance the gospel among men, and was willing to "become all things to all men for their spiritual good?" and when he saw it needful for the winning of their souls, he laid aside his authority, and fell to entreaties and beseechings with them, Rom. xii. 1; 2 Cor. v. 20; x. 1; Philem. ix. 10. And observe what he says, 1 Thes. ii. 7, 11. "We were gentle among you, as a nurse cherisheth her children:" "And," saith he, "we exhorted you as a father doth his children." Now, as a tender nurse or father will not impose any upon weak children to feed them, at whom they have the greatest aversion, nor tell them that they shall have no food unless they take it from such hands; so neither ought judicatories to intrude pastors upon dissenting or reclaiming parishes. They pray for the spreading of Christ's glory and kingdom, and therefore should not counteract their prayers, as they manifestly do by violent settlements; for thus they lay the foundations of strong prejudices in people's breasts against ministers and the success of the glorious gospel, and frequently drive people quite away from the gospel net, to the great increase of ignorance and immorality. This course is directly against the bible, that forbids us to give any occasion of stumbling or prejudice unto others, whereby their edification may be hindered, Rom. xiv. 13, 19, 21. Alas! people have naturally strong enough prejudices against the gospel itself, be the pastor never so acceptable; and what a pity is it that occasion should be given them to conceive prejudice also against the preacher of it, seeing thereby the strong holds of Satan are rendered more impregnable. For how can it be expected that a parish will be free of stumbling or prejudiced against a man that makes it his business to obtain a right to their stipend, and will not part with it when they show the uttermost aversion to him, but gets himself, viis et modis, thrust in upon them? Will they not be ready to look upon him as "an earthly-minded man, greedy of filthy lucre," that thrusts himself into the "priest's office for a piece of bread," that seeks the fleece more than the flock, "and minds his own things more than the things of Jesus Christ?" Is not this the way to bring both the person and ministry of such a man into contempt among the people, to shut their ears against his admonitions, and render his labours among them unsuccessful? Whereas, should a minister come among a people by their call, he has a fair door opened to him to promote their salvation: they think themselves bound to attend his ministry, receive him into their houses, hearken to his counsels, and submit to his reproofs; and so the gospel hath free course among that people.

5. Seeing the right of Christians to judge for themselves in matters of religion is undeniably secured to them both by the light of nature and of revelation; they must consequently have an interest in the choice of their teachers. For if a man may judge for himself concerning the schemes of doctrine and ways of salvation laid before him, and may prefer one to another; it must follow, that he hath also a right to judge who is fittest to instruct him according to it; otherwise he might fall into the hands of those who would lead him into schemes quite opposite to what he hath chosen. It is evident that both scripture and reason allow men a judgment of discretion about the pastors to whom they are to commit the instructing, guiding, and edifying of their precious souls. That text is plain for it, in 1 John iv. 1, "Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they be of God: because many false prophets are gone out into the world." Likewise that text, Mat. vii. 15, 16, "Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly are ravening wolves. Ye shall know them by their fruits." And that in 2 John ver. 10, "If there come any to you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not." From all which texts it is evident, that Christians have right to judge concerning those who bring them true gospel-doctrine, and whom they are to receive, and whom not. The Bereans are highly commended for their using this right, Acts xvi. 11. And Christ declares it to be the privilege of his people to distinguish the voice of a stranger or hireling from the voice of a true shepherd, and to flee from the one, and follow the other, John x. 4, 5.

6. The consent of parishes to the settlement of a minister is requisite to constitute the pastoral relation between him and his flock, and the obligation of mutual offices and duties one to another. It was anciently a received maxim among Presbyterians, that the consent of the flock is as necessary to fix the pastoral relation, as the consent of the minister; seeing the tie is mutual and reciprocal.

7. The apostles' example, in ordaining pastors by the choice and consent of the people, was followed by the primitive church for many centuries after them, as Eusebius and others testify. And the learned Turretine, vol. iii. quest. 24, De jure vocationis, quotes many of the ancient fathers and councils as maintaining the people's right. And Mr. Petrie, in his Church History, p. 63, 65, observes, That the church of Rome in the seventh century had not given up with this principle of Christianity. It hath been the fixed principle of this church, and of our reformers from the very dawning of the reformation, That congregations ought to have ministers settled among them with their consent. This can be made evident from our books of discipline, and many acts of assemblies; and this is confirmed by assembly, 1736, act 14, wherein they declare, "That it is, and hath been since the reformation, the principle of this church, that no minister shall be intruded into any parish contrary to the will of the congregation; and therefore they seriously recommend to all the judicatories of this church, to have a due regard to the said principle in planting vacant congregations, as they regard the glory of God, and the edification of the body of Christ." But it is to be regretted, that neither the ancient principles of this church, nor the recommendation of assembly, 1736, are much regarded in the settlement of churches at this day, more than the scriptural arguments afore-mentioned for the people's right. O how great ground hath this backsliding church to imitate that famous general assembly, 1596, who made the thrusting of men into congregations one special cause of their keeping a day for solemn fasting and humiliation before the Lord! Likewise it is to be noticed, what they observe of these intruders, "That they manifest thereafter, that they were not called of God." O that judicatories would keep in mind the apostle's warning against being "partakers of other men's sins, by laying hands suddenly upon them;" and would consider how far they may be accountable for these precious souls, who may perish in an ignorant and Christless condition, during the scatterings and prejudices of congregations intruded upon! Surely that text hath an alarming sound to all concerned in intrusions, Jer. xxiii. 1, 2, "Woe be unto the pastors that destroy and scatter the sheep of my pastures, saith the Lord. Therefore, thus saith the Lord God of Israel, against the pastors that feed my people, Ye have scattered my flock, and driven them away, and have not visited them; behold, I will visit upon you the evil of your doings, saith the Lord." Likewise the xxxiv. chap. of Ezekiel hath some very awful things relative to this case. O that the Spirit of God would carry them home to the hearts of men, with such power and efficacy, that their eyes may be opened in time; so that intrusions, scatterings, and contempt of Christ's flock, may not issue in the destruction of vital religion, and of this once famous national church!

This woful contempt and disregarding of the flock of Christ, by intruding pastors upon them, neglecting their petitions, and otherwise, could not but be very provoking to a holy God; wherefore he was pleased to visit this church with severe awful rebukes and particularly with violent attacks upon her beautiful constitution, running it down, and promoting independent schemes of government, and setting up new models of congregational churches, with new improvements. This was first attempted by Mr. John Glass, minister at Tealing, and Mr. Francis Archibald, minister of Guthrie. After a while's more secret management, they came at length to vent their principles openly, and to go about preaching them in the streets, fields, &c., and printed several pamphlets in favour of their new opinions. They found fault with our Confession of Faith and Formula, and refused to subscribe them: they maintained that there is no warrant for national churches under the New Testament, but only for congregational: that single congregations are not subject to any superior judicatory, nor censurable by them: that they may ordain their own pastors, and that all the members have right to govern: that the church of Israel was but a typical church, and their kings were ecclesiastical officers: that their national covenanting with God was typical, and not to be imitated by Christian nations: that our national covenanting was unwarrantable, and is not obligatory on us: that our martyrs, who suffered for adhering to our covenants, were so far unenlightened: that Christian magistrates have no more power in religious matters than others, and ought not to employ their power to advance religion, to make laws with penalties in favour of it, nor to restrain or punish heretics or false teachers, nor to give encouragement to good Christians more than other good subjects; that the Christian religion ought not to be defended by arms: that the example of the reforming kings of Judah in punishing idolatry and false worship, or encouraging true religion, is not to be imitated. These, and a great many other new and strange doctrines, they spread; and would by no means be reclaimed, nor forbear venting them. At length the church processed them both for their singular doctrines and practices. It was the opinion of many, that seeing they were both very pious men, acting according to their light, and had been and might be further useful in the church, they should not be severely dealt with, but only brought under prohibitions and restraints; and if they could be engaged to stay with their own congregations, and no more to spread their new opinions, they might be connived at. Likewise, many had greater sympathy with Mr. Archibald than with the other, in regard he was led off by him in his simplicity to these new things, neither did he vent himself so against our covenants as he did: but seeing none of them would promise to forbear, they were both suspended; and, upon their contemning the church's sentence, they were afterwards deposed. Yet the church showed much regard to them both; for, sometime after, they took off the sentences, and reponed them both to the ministry in general, though not to their churches. They did all they could to shake the established church government, by setting up Independent churches in several places of the land, and ordaining several mechanics and illiterate persons to be their ministers: and they preached and wrote for Independency: but their pamphlets are confuted, the divine right of Presbytery established, and the absurdities of the Independent scheme laid open, by Mr. Aytone in his Original Constitution of the Christian church, and by several others: so that we need add no more to what is already written, but our approbation thereof.

At the very same time the Lord was pleased to visit this church with a far more terrible rebuke, by permitting professor Simson to vent Arian errors among his students at Glasgow, for which a process was commenced against him by the presbytery of Glasgow; and after some time it came to the assembly, and continued before them, assemblies 1727, 1728, 1729. And though the process was drawn out to a great length, by the extraordinary methods he took to defend himself; yet it must be acknowledged that all the three foresaid assemblies manifested their zeal and concern for the orthodox faith against any thing that tended to Arianism, as appears from the process in print. At length the assembly found it proved, that Mr. Simson had denied the necessary existence of our Lord Jesus Christ and the numerical oneness of the three persons of the Trinity in substance or essence; and had uttered several other words derogatory to the supreme deity of our Lord Jesus Christ. Notwithstanding the professor still denied that he taught these opinions, as he calls them, the assembly in their act calls them gross errors, and said, they were contrary to the sentiments of his mind; and, if he uttered such words, they must be only a slip of his tongue. He likewise came to give it under his hand, that he disclaimed and renounced all these erroneous expressions, and made an orthodox confession of his faith concerning the glorious Trinity and the supreme deity of our Lord Jesus Christ, both before the assembly 1728 and 1729. And whereas he had said that Christus est summus Deus, is to be taken cum grano salis; and that summus Deus, and the only true God, may be understood in a sense as including the Father's personal property, and so not applicable to the Son; he declared he was exceedingly sorry for giving any offence by such ways of speaking, and said, that summus Deus, and the only true God, are equally applicable to the Father and the Son, and not in any lower sense to the Son than to the Father; and that he adhered to the truth of Christ's necessary existence, and the numerical oneness in essence of the blessed Trinity. But notwithstanding of all these renunciations and declarations, which came so very late, many in the assembly declared that he deserved deposition, because at the beginning of the process he refused to answer questions for clearing himself, and had neglected many opportunities, for two years' time, of satisfaction to the judicatories as to the soundness of his faith concerning these important articles, when called upon to do it. But the assembly, 1728, because of his confessions and orthodox declarations, and for other considerations, proceeded no further than to suspend him from preaching and teaching, and all exercise of any ecclesiastical power or function; and delayed the finishing of the process till next assembly, that they might know the mind of the presbyteries concerning him.

When the assembly 1729 met, he made a long moving speech before them, declaring his orthodoxy, which was printed. The assembly finished the affair, by confirming the sentence of suspension formerly past, and giving it as their judgment, "That it is not fit nor safe that he be further employed in teaching divinity, and instructing of youth designed for the holy ministry." The generality of presbyteries, notwithstanding of his confessions and declarations, had sent up to this assembly their instructions for his deposition, with which they ought to have complied; especially seeing by a former process in the year 1717, he had been found teaching Arminian doctrine, which the assembly discharged him to do for the future: and yet, contrary to that prohibition, it was found proved by a committee of assembly, that he persisted to teach the foresaid doctrine. This the assembly knew very well, and might have called for that other process. Some alleged, it would be better to keep it over his head undiscussed, to prevent after designs of reponing him to teach. And some said, it would be safer for truth to bind up his pen by a suspension, and by keeping him under it, than by a deposition to provoke a man of his learning to make open attacks upon the most important truths of our holy religion. And it must be owned, that he replied nothing to all that was written against him, but continued silent under the suspension for many years, until the day of his death, without any motion or endeavour by any to get it taken off. It is desirable also to find the assembly, in their last act concerning him, expressing "their thankfulness to God, for directing all the judicatories of this church, which had this process under their consideration, which includes all the presbyteries thereof, so happily, that there hath not appeared the least difference of sentiment; but on the contrary, there hath been the most perfect and unanimous agreement among them, as to the doctrine of the glorious Trinity, and the proper supreme deity of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, according as the same is revealed in the holy scriptures, and contained in our Confession of Faith and Catechisms." It was much feared that the seeds of Arianism were sown in this church by professor Simson and others; wherefore there were many excellent books written at this time against Arianism and Socinianism, and in defence of the foresaid doctrine of the glorious Trinity, and the proper supreme deity of our Lord Jesus Christ; and being so well written, we need add nothing, but join our Testimony therewith, and pray that Arianism may never more set up its head in this land. Amen.

Although God was thus visibly contending with the judicatories of this church, for their disregarding his flock and remnant in the land; yet it is matter of deep regret, that, instead of reforming, they proceeded to greater heights in their arbitrary decisions relating to them: for in the years 1729—1731, and afterwards, we find the complaints of worthy ministers, elders, and bodies of Christian people, concerning intrusions upon congregations greatly increased; which occasioned many remonstrances, dissents, and protestations in the assemblies, commissions, and inferior judicatories. In the assembly, 1730, when the stream of violence began to run very high, many entered their dissents against the settlements of Sutton and Old Machar, but were denied liberty to record them, which made a great noise, and increased the ferment among the people; but, instead of yielding or doing any thing to quiet them, that assembly summarily made an act, discharging the recording, as usual, of reasons of dissent against the determination of church judicatories; without remitting the affair to presbyteries to know their mind about it, according to former acts of assembly. There were several remonstrances and petitions presented by numbers of people to the synods of Merse and Lothian, but not regarded. Likewise they gave in a paper, signed and adhered to by great numbers, to assembly, 1731, complaining of violent settlements; but got no hearing. All which proceedings did awaken many honest and zealous ministers to correspond and meet for drawing up a representation and petition to the assembly, 1732, concerning the intrusions and other grievances; which was accordingly drawn up, signed, and adhered to by forty-two ministers and three elders; wherein they expressed not only their own sense of these evils, but also the sense of many others through the church, who had not access to sign the said paper. And seeing we think ourselves called to adhere to the honest testimony given therein against many of the evils of the present time, we shall, as an evidence of our approbation and adherence, briefly insert the contents of it in this our testimony.

In their petition offered to the assembly, 1732, they humbly moved, that the assembly should address the king and parliament concerning several grievances of this church, which they only can redress, such as the imposing of the sacramental test, and conformity to the English liturgy and ceremonies, upon the members of this church, when serving the king in England and Ireland: the toleration established in Scotland, whereby error, superstition, and profaneness, are greatly encouraged, and church discipline weakened: the establishing of patronages, subversive of the right of congregations to choose their own pastors: the not receiving addresses from this church to the house of peers, because not directed to the lords spiritual: the introducing from England into some courts in Scotland a form of swearing, by laying the hands upon and kissing the gospels. Also they represent, that, notwithstanding it is the undeniable right of the Christian congregations to have the free choice of their own pastors, and their call and consent are necessary to found the pastoral relation between ministers and them, according to the word of God, our book of discipline, acts of the general assembly, and the concurring suffrages and unanswerable arguments of the most eminent divines both at home and abroad; yet many ministers have been imposed and forced upon Christian congregations, when dissenting and reclaiming, and that especially by sentences of the commission for several years past; and not only where presentations were insisted upon, but also where there was none, but the right fallen into the presbytery's hands. And the commission have appointed committees to try and ordain ministers for vacant congregations, not only without the concurrence of presbyteries and synods concerned, who have best right, and are fittest to judge therein, but in direct opposition to their minds; and calls have been received, not moderated in presbyteries, but attested only by public notaries. Likewise the commission have repealed several sentences of synods, when they had but a small quorum of ministers, much inferior in number to those who passed them: and of late years, especially in the years 1729—1731, there were many supernumerary elders named to be members of commissions, beyond the proportion allowed by the acts of assembly, many whereof reside at Edinburgh, and are brought in to vote upon occasions; and there is ground to question if they be qualified according to acts of assembly. Wherefore, for remedying and preventing such intrusions, they humbly moved, That the assembly should repeal the commission's sentences appointing them, such as may come regularly before them; and discharge in time coming all settlements without the consent of elders and Christian people; and enact, that no call or subscriptions for ministers be sustained but such as are attested by order of presbyteries, or verified before them or their committees; and, if the commission shall in time coming appoint committees to try or ordain ministers without consent of the congregation and presbyteries immediately concerned, that the said committees shall be discharged to proceed, until the assembly give their judgment, in case the causes are sisted before the assembly by complaint or protestation: and that appeals from sentences of synods be not referred in time coming to the determination of the commission, but reserved for the assembly's decision; unless it be provided that the sederunt of the commission judging therein be supernumerary to the synods in ministers as well as elders; it being disagreeable to our principles, that a greater number of ministers should be subjected to the authority of a lesser; and that the commission be better regulated both as to the number and qualifications of elders therein than at present; and that the assembly enact, at appointing of their commission, that if any of their actings shall be found contrary to the acts, constitutions, and known principles of this church, that they shall not only be censured for the same, but their said acts shall also be reversed ; and, if any protestation or complaint be entered against their sentences, it shall be sufficient to sist all parties concerned before the general assembly. Also they plead, that the assembly may repeal the 7th act of assembly, 1730, discharging the recording reasons of dissent, as being passed irregularly, without consulting presbyteries, and which must prove a very heavy grievance to many, if it stand in force.

They complain likewise, that some judicatories, who have testified their just displeasure against ministers and probationers, for their unworthy and offensive practice in accepting presentations contrary to our known principles, have been condemned by the commission for it : and therefore desire the assembly may give an effectual check to such dangerous practices, and that none be licensed or ordained that favour this course. Also they complain of several innovations in the method and strain of preaching introduced of late by some preachers and young ministers, which are very offensive to many of God's people, and an obstruction to spiritual edification. And, though some former assemblies have referred it to their commissions to bring in an overture thereanent, nothing is yet done ; therefore they humbly move, that the assembly may provide an antidote against these evils. They also desire the assembly to emit a solemn warning against professor Simson's errors, and others which are spread through the land, in order to prevent the infection of them.

As to the act of assembly, 1732, concerning the method of planting vacant churches, which was then but an overture, they show their dislike to it, as it gives much power to Jacobite and disaffected heritors in the settling of parishes, which is not agreeable to the scriptures and our known principles : but, say they, it cannot be turned to a standing act, unless the generality of presbyteries consent to it, which they hope is not to be expected in this case.

Now though the evils above complained of were manifest grievances, and the brethren's representation concerning them was drawn up in a humble and moderate strain, and signed by forty-two worthy ministers, and several of them old reverend fathers, and was presented in a dutiful manner according to order ; yet it is to be regretted that it was not allowed so much as a hearing by the assembly ; which obliged the petitioners to protest, and publish their paper to the world. Likewise there was a petition of the same nature from many hundreds of elders and Christian people given in to that assembly, which had the same effect. This strange conduct of that and preceding assemblies towards many godly ministers and people, exceedingly stumbled many, lessened the regard which was wont to be paid to general assemblies, and paved the way to the schism which soon followed upon it. Yet the assembly, 1732, did not step here, but proceeded to turn the overture about planting of churches into a standing act, though evidently disagreeable to the mind of presbyteries, and the general opinion of the church : which increased the ferment through the land to a higher pitch than ever. Alas ! this was not like the conduct of our old suffering fathers, who dreaded a schism in the church like fire, and were careful to prevent and crush it at the first appearance. But when God hath a controversy with a church or people, and designs to bring a stroke upon them, he ordinarily leaves their leaders to infatuate measures, so as they have neither skill nor will to take any wise step to ward off the blow.

That act of the assembly, 1732, greatly inflamed this poor church for two or three years : but seeing at that time unanswerable arguments were brought against it in several pamphlets and sermons then published, to which we adhere, and seeing likewise it was repealed by a subsequent assembly, as contrary to the mind and rules of this church, and prejudicial to it ; we shall not here insist much upon the evil of it. Only in regard there are many dissatisfied with the repealing of it, and allege it was the same with the act of parliament, 1690, for which the church had great regard for many years, we shall show the manifest difference that is between them, both in the words and the sense which was put upon them. The act, 1690, runs thus : "That in case of the vacancy of any particular church, and for supplying the same with a minister, the heritors of the said parish, being Protestants, and the elders, are to name and propose the person to the whole congregation, to be either approved or disapproved by them ; and if they disapprove, that the disapprovers give their reason, to the effect the affair may be cognosed upon by the presbytery of the bounds, at whose judgment, and by whose determination, the calling and entry of a particular minister is to be ordered and concluded." The act, 1732, being well known, we shall not resume the words, but observe the difference in these things : 1. The act, 1690, is by a civil court, the act, 1732, by an ecclesiastical ; and though it might be expected that the latter would in their acts keep closer by the rule of the word than the former, yet the act, 1732, is more distant from that rule than the act, 1690, in regard the act, 1732, tends more to spoil congregations of their rights, and countenance intrusions upon them, than the act, 1690, doth. 2. By the act, 1690, the heritors and elders are only empowered to name and propose a person to the whole congregation ; but, by the act, 1732, they are empowered to elect and call one to be minister of the parish. 3. According to act, 1690, the election was not to be held as finished until the man was proposed to the congregation, and their approbation had; and if they disapproved, the affair was to stop as unfinished until the presbytery gave their judgment whether to proceed further in it or not: but the act, 1732, holds the election as finished by the votes of the heritors and elders, and the man to be legally elected and called to be minister of the parish, before the consent of the people be asked. 4. By the act 1690, and another passed soon after to explain it, all unqualified or disaffected heritors were excluded from voting; but by act, 1732, all heritors whatsoever, whether hearers or not, were allowed to vote, if they were not professed papists: so that, in many parishes where the disaffected heritors were supernumerary to the other, they had power to thrust in a minister upon a well-affected congregation. 5. For what appears from the words of the act, 1690, the heritors and elders might have acted as distinct bodies in the nomination, and the one might have had a negative upon the other therein, and so the heritors' nomination would not be valid without the concurrence of the body of elders; for by the act, the man was to be named by the elders, as well as by the heritors! but by act, 1732, it was expressly provided, that the heritors and elders should elect in a conjunct body; so that, considering the superior number and influence of heritors in most places, ministers might be chosen where the eldership and whole body of the congregation reclaimed, as frequently has happened. 6. The act, 1690, and the act, 1732, differed prodigiously as to the sense and meaning put upon the words thereof. The execution of the act, 1690, being intrusted to presbyteries, the sense they then put upon the approbation of the congregation, and the reasons of the disapprovers, was far from the sense lately put upon them: by their approbation, the church then understood their judgment concerning the candidate's gifts of preaching and prayer, that they judged them suitable to their capacities, and adapted to their edification; and if the body of the congregation disapproved the man nominated, and gave for their reasons that his gifts were not edifying to them, nor suited to their capacities, and that they could not in conscience consent to his being their minister: such reasons, given by a knowing and well disposed people, were then judged sufficient to stop the affair, lay aside competing candidates, and to proceed to a new election. But, by the sense put upon the act, 1732, no reasons or objections could be received but against the man's life or doctrine; and if the people did not prove error or immorality against him by witnesses, they must receive him as their pastor: so that by this sense the people had no more interest or concern in the settlement of their pastor, than those of any other congregation; which is most absurd, and different from the sense of the act, 1690.

Our noble patrons at the revolution being sensible of the violent intrusions which had been made upon parishes under prelacy and patronage, they, in the year 1690, restored Presbyterian government, abolished patronages, and put the people's rights under the guardianship of presbyteries, who then took special care of them, according to our known principles; so that their settlements gave general satisfaction. Our judicatories then understood the act, 1690, as designed to deliver parishes from the intrusions made upon them under patronages, and to restore them to their primitive liberty, according to the word of God. This is evident from the assembly, 1712, their approving the commission's address to the queen against patronages, in which are these words: "Whereby your majesty may plainly perceive the act, 1690, abolishing patronages, must be understood to be a part of our Presbyterian constitution, secured to us by the treaty of union for ever; and that the parliament, 1690, was sincerely desirous only to restore the church to its just and primitive liberty, in calling ministers in a way agreeable to the word of God." That this was the sense put upon the act, 1690, appears also from the form of calls then constantly made use of by the church, which is printed in our larger overtures, and runs thus:—"We the heritors and elders of the parish of _____, have agreed, with the advice and consent of the parishioners, to invite, call," &c. No call could then be received without that clause, "and the consent of the parishioners." No doubt the words of the act, 1619, might have been perverted to the people's hurt in some hands: but the church being allowed to explain and execute that act agreeable to their own principles, as they then did, the people continued easy under it, as finding their rights safe, their consent always necessary, and no intrusions made upon them. This consent of the people, in settlements, had been judged necessary by this church in all periods since the reformation.

Object. Those who favour intrusions, object, "That by act of assembly, 1649, settlements might sometimes be made contrary to the inclinations of the majority of the people, if their dissent arose from causeless prejudices; and consequently, that ministers might be settled against the mind of the congregations, in case they had nothing to object against their life and doctrine."

Ans. We must certainly understand and explain the act, 1649, by the known principles and practice of the church at that time, and by the second book of discipline, which the assembly, 1649, and the whole church, had several times sworn to in the national covenant. In that second book, our church three or four times declares for the consent of the congregation as necessary in settling of ministers, as also against intruding any man upon them, contrary to their will; and affirms that this order of settlement is according to the word of God, and the practice of the apostolical and primitive kirk. And that famous assembly, 1638, which abolished Prelacy and restored Presbytery, explained the national covenant as binding us to maintain the second book of discipline, December 8th. Likewise the assembly did, within ten days after, expressly renew their declaration for the people's rights, by their act, December 18th, viz., "That no person be intruded into any office of the kirk, contrary to the will of the congregation to which they are appointed." And that the Presbyterians of that period were of the same mind, appears from the 8th act of Parliament, 1640, by which they restored to presbyteries the patronages of those parishes which the bishops had possessed, but with this salvo of the interest of the parishes, "that they be settled upon the suit and calling of the congregation," according to the acts and practice of this church. And from the assembly, 1642, their act, August 3d, for making lists of probationers for patrons to choose upon; they appointed, that "Presbyteries, with the consent of the most or best part of the congregation concerned, shall make up the list of six willing to accept." And by the directory for the ordination of ministers, agreed upon by the assembly at Westminster, and approved by the general assembly, 1645, the candidate is appointed to preach three several days, and to converse with the people among whom he is to serve, for the end that they may have trial of his gifts for their edification; and afterwards they were to signify their consent to the presbytery as they found cause. From which it is evident, that church judicatories then allowed the people to judge of suitableness of the candidate's gifts for their edification, and held their consent necessary to his ordination. And that the assembly, 1649, were of the same mind, is plain from their swearing to the second book of discipline, which declares so strongly for the consent of congregations in settlements, which surely they would be careful not to contradict by their act. They indeed lodged the election in the hands of the session; but at the same time appointed them to use all possible tenderness for obtaining harmony in the congregation, and to proceed to a new election, in case the major part of the congregation dissented from their choice, if their dissent was not grounded on causeless prejudices. Now these elders, who were the electors, being the representatives of the people, and the most eminent in the parish for piety and knowledge, would doubtless previously consult the inclinations of the better sort, particularly the communicants, who are properly the members of the congregation; and if they found that the most knowing and religious part of the congregation was for the settlement, they might reckon that the causeless prejudices of others, not complete members of the congregation, were to be less regarded. We are firmly persuaded the church in that period were far from reckoning it a causeless prejudice against a man, if the most religious or knowing part of a congregation declared their dissent from the session's choice, because they found the preacher's gifts unsuitable for their edification; no, in that case, the session would have been appointed to make a new election. The people then were not confined to objections only against the life and doctrine of the candidate, but allowed to dissent from, and object against, the election itself, and give what reasons or grounds for it they thought proper; and if the session could not satisfy them, after all pains taken, they proceeded to a new election. All this appears from a known pamphlet, printed anno 1733, intituled, "Account of the Method of electing a Minister to the parish of Strathmiglo, in two instances in the years 1654 and 1655, in a Letter to the Minister there." If it be asked, What is then to be meant by causeless prejudices mentioned in the act, 1649? Ans. Any groundless or trifling objection against a man, because of his mean extraction, low stature, bodily infirmity, or blemish; or because of some groundless report, or the strictness of his walk, zeal for his principles, or the like: in which groundless prejudice the assembly might judge that ignorant and unreasonable people were not to be too much indulged; though at the same time they enjoin all possible tenderness in dealing with parishes to bring them to harmony, even then when a lesser part of the congregation dissented from the election, without relevant objections.

But, lastly, seeing this objection from act, 1649, is commonly brought to countenance the intruding of men who force themselves in upon reclaiming parishes, by accepting and holding fast by presentations; we take this occasion freely to own, that a congregation's offence against a man for evident tokens of "earthly-mindedness, greedy of filthy lucre, and unconcernedness for the success of the gospel, is not a causeless prejudice;" as for instance, when there is a gospel-door open for preachers to get access to parishes, for a man to despise that door, and choose rather to enter by the door of a presentation and violence, and thereby endeavour to thrust himself in upon a congregation against their will, secure a title to their stipend, so as no man else can have it, keep fast his hold against all persuasions and entreaties, keep the people long without gospel ordinances, bind the heavy yoke of patronage upon their neck, and hinder them from getting a minister whom they love and desire; now, when a man acts so directly against the interest of the gospel, the advantage of precious souls, and his own professed principles and engagements; and when a congregation dissents from his settlement upon these grounds; we cannot say their dissent is grounded upon causeless prejudices: nay, they are so well grounded, that the day hath been, when church-judicatories would have stopt their mouths who would be guilty of such things.

Object. "Though it be wrong for preachers to take such methods, yet judicatories are under necessity by the law to settle them, or keep parishes vacant."

Ans. 1. Seeing intrusions into churches are contrary to scripture, reason, and our professed principles, no laws or commands of men can oblige us to be accessory to them; for seeing Christ commands us to do all for the edification of his flock, we must never act for its destruction, as intrusions manifestly are. Whenever human laws clash with the divine, it is indisputably "better to obey God than man."

2. There is no law yet in being, that obligeth us to intrude men into churches: for though there be an act passed in 1712, for restoring patronages, yet it is expressly reserved to the presbytery and church-judicatories the power of judging of the presentee's qualifications and fitness for the charge to which he is presented. Now, the power of judging of a man's qualifications must not be restricted to those which render him fit for the ministry in general, but must be extended to qualifications necessary to make him fit for being minister of the parish to which he is presented; because a man may be fit and qualified for one charge, who is not so for another. Now, if a presbytery finds that a presentee is incapable of answering the design of a gospel-minister to a parish, and is in no condition to instruct or edify their souls, by reason of his offending them, or their incurable aversion to hear him, or submit to his ministry; they may safely judge that such a man is not qualified nor fit to be settled in that parish, and therefore may set him aside. And if, in case of an appeal, the assembly affirm the presbytery's sentence, the law is most express and clear, that the cause must take end as the assembly decerns, according to act 7. parl. 1567, which act is confirmed by act 1. parl. 1581; and this act is again ratified by act 1. parl. 1592, which act is ratified by act 5. parl. 1690, and stands still in force, being not only ratified by the union, but also confirmed by queen Anne's law, in 1712, for establishing patronages. And as the general assemblies of this church have been always before 1712, in possession of the foresaid power, so well secured to them by law; so also, since that time, their sentences concerning all presentations have been submitted to and held as final. From which it is evident, that judicatories are under no force by law to make intrusions or violent settlements. Why then should churchmen, who ought to be guardians of the church's liberties, go about to destroy them by violent proceedings? Is it not soon enough for church-courts to take such destructive courses, when the parliament makes new laws obliging them to it?

But, to return to the state of the church anno 1732: this was a very critical time to her, and most afflicting to many of her best friends, by reason of the stretching of church authority: the intrusions made upon parishes; the disregarding of remonstrances and petitions of a godly remnant both of ministers and people; the passing that act, 1732, which encouraged heritors not of our communion to impose ministers upon many parishes; and refusing to record ministers' dissents with their reasons against such deeds. These proceedings were grievous to the hearts of honest ministers, and provoked many to go to pulpits and testify against them, particularly at the opening of synods, and other occasions; and severals of them printed their sermons, as a testimony against these prevailing evils. Though this was very offensive to many of our leaders, and to the court chaplains, whose number was then increased, yet none was so much noticed as the Rev. Mr. Ebenezer Erskine, minister of Stirling, whose turn was to preach at the opening of the synod at Perth, in October, 1732. The synod judged him censurable, and appointed him to be rebuked for his sermon, because in it he had impugned the acts and proceedings of the assembly, and had used some strong expressions against the judicatories and ministers of this church, which they reckoned indecent. Upon which Mr. Erskine appealed to the assembly, 1733, who affirmed the synod's sentence, and rebuked him at their bar. Whereupon Mr. Erskine, with three other ministers, gave in a paper protesting against the assembly's sentence, viz. Mr. Wilson at Perth, Mr. Moncrieff at Abernethy, and Mr. Fisher at Kinclaven; and they all protested for liberty to testify against the act, assembly, 1732, or the like defections. This protestation the assembly, 1733, could not bear with.

As it was very unwise in the synod to proceed against Mr. Erskine for his sermon in such a judicial manner, so it was in the assembly to resent the protestation as they did. In former times such protestations were not reckoned so criminal as now. Mr. Andrew Hunter, minister, protested against the assembly at Edinburgh, 1586.

for releasing Mr. Patrick Adamson from the sentence of excommunication without signs of repentance; and Mr. Andrew Melvill and Mr. Thomas Buchanan adhered to his protest. Mr. John Davidson, minister at Prestonpans, protested against the assembly at Dundee, 1598, for allowing ministers to vote in parliament in name of the kirk, where the king was present. Mr. James Melvill protested against the assembly meeting at Holyrood-house, 1602, where the king was present. Mr. David Calderwood protested against assembly, 1649, for enacting the directory for election of ministers. Yet none of all these were censured for their protestations: neither do the house of peers censure those who protest against their proceedings. Likewise the Twelve Brethren, who were rebuked by assembly, 1722, for impugning the act of assembly, 1720, against the "Marrow," offered their protestation against the censure; as did Mr. Gabriel Wilson against the admonition of the assembly, 1723: yet none of these were censured for their protestations. And doubtless it had been greatly for the interest and peace of the church, that assembly, 1733, had followed the example of their wise predecessors. But now their authority must be screwed up higher than at former times: wherefore the assembly, without hearing the four protesting ministers any further before them, summarily proceeded to appoint their commission, in August thereafter, to suspend them, if they did not retract their protestations, and show their sorrow for the same; and to proceed to a higher censure, if they disobeyed the said sentence.

Accordingly the commission, in August, suspended all the four brethren for adhering to their foresaid protestation. And upon their acting contrary to the suspension, the commission, in November, determined to proceed presently to a higher censure against them, and would not delay it until March, though the assembly's act allowed it. This decision was carried only by Mr. Gouldie, the moderator's casting vote. And, it is to be observed, the commission went on in this forward and hasty procedure against the four brethren, notwithstanding of the earnest applications and intercessions of many synods, presbyteries, kirk-sessions, magistrates, and others throughout Scotland, in their behalf, pleading that the commission might delay them, spare them, or deal tenderly with them. The sentence which the commission came to against the four protesting ministers was, to "loose their relation from their respective parishes, and declare them no longer ministers of this church to employ them." And they declared their charges vacant from the date of this sentence.

As the judicatories at this time seemed to act with much heat and severity, in order to support or screw up their authority; so we must own that the four brethren seemed to show no little honour and stiffness in opposing their authority, and despising their sentences: for they would give no ear to their friends, who dealt with them, to show some subjection to the judicatories, as to their fathers and superiors; and though they were just now abusing their church power, and unwarrantably provoking their children, yet some regard is to be shown to their authority, even when so doing, as we to our natural parents, though correcting us in an arbitrary way; according to Heb. xii. 6. As to Mr. Erskine, though he was contending for the truth, many of his friends wished that he had not used such asperity and tartness of expression about the ministers and judicatories of the church as he did; and many of the leading men in judicatories said, This was the only thing they quarrelled in his sermon: but Mr. Erskine would make no acknowledgement or submission of any sort, though even Mr. Wilson and Mr. Moncrieff said in their reasons of dissent, that they do not "pretend to justify his modes of expression" in that sermon; and they grant that in several cases it is most proper to use soft and modest expressions in maintaining of truth. We do not see that it would have been any loss to the truth the four brethren appeared for, that they had all showed more respect to the supreme authority of the church in their conduct than they did; particularly, though they had forbore to protest, as they did in express words, against the sentence of the assembly as unjust, and against any censure they should inflict on them as null and void of itself; and if, upon their being suspended, any minister or probationer should preach in their parishes, the same should be held as intrusion upon their charges. And as they protested, so they submitted not to the sentence for one day; though many worthy ministers have formerly submitted to unjust sentences of this sort, to show their regard to the authority of lawful judicatories of a church, which they owned as a true church: and this is approved by the most orthodox and judicious divines of the Presbyterian persuasion. Again, the brethren had the more encouragement to have submitted for a time, that they had reason to expect the next assembly would take off the sentences, consider their complaints, and do them all manner of justice; and this they might have looked for, from the interposition of so many synods and presbyteries with the commission in their favours. And though many of their friends were disobliged and offended at them, for their contemning the authority of the church, yet there was a great plurality in the assembly, 1734, for restoring them to their charges and the communion of the church; and neither that nor any

When the sentence of the commission in November, 1733, loosing the relation of the four brethren from their charges, was passed, many protested against it, as did the four brethren themselves, who also appealed to the first free, faithful, and reforming general assembly of the church of Scotland. Had they stopped here, they had done well; but they went a great deal further, by making a secession from the judicatories of this church, and in a short time after constituting themselves into a distinct judicatory for licensing preachers, and ordaining ministers, wherever they should find encouragement. At the same time they protested they would still hold communion with all who were true Presbyterians, and groaned under, and wrestled against, the evils they had been complaining of. This was then their declared resolution, though, alas! they soon departed from it. At first they seemed to be determined to continue in ministerial communion with many worthy ministers they had been formerly intimate with, though these had not freedom to secede as they had done, nor go all their lengths: and Mr. Erskine, in his answers to the synod, owned that there was "still a body of faithful ministers in the church of Scotland, with whom he did not reckon himself worthy to be compared." Which body had the truths contended for at heart, together with the peace of the church, as well as the four brethren. And seeing the case was such, the brethren ought in justice to have communicated counsels with that faithful body of ministers, who were willing to meet with them at the ensuing assembly, before they had taken two such strong steps as their secession and constitution: which uncommon steps, they might easily see, tended greatly to affect that whole body, yea, even to divide and rend them asunder, together with the people who should adhere to them respectively, in case that faithful body should not have light to go into all the measures of the four brethren. Whatever thoughts the brethren might have about the union of the church in general, it might have been expected they would have showed something of concern for the union of that faithful body of ministers, for whom they then professed a great regard. Moreover, since they had appealed for redress to the first faithful general assembly, they should have delayed any such extraordinary steps until the meeting of the next assembly then approaching, and so have kept the matter entire until the whole case was laid before them; which the brethren themselves should have been ready to do. For, considering how sensibly touched the whole church was with their case, and what preparations were making for the approaching assembly, the brethren could not be sure but it might prove the reforming assembly they had appealed unto. O what dreadful calamities to the church might have been prevented, had the four brethren continued praying, and deliberating upon the foresaid two steps until the meeting of the assembly in May, 1734; and not have so precipitately seceded from the national church, and constituted themselves into an anti-presbytery, by which means, alas! they became too much engaged in honour to persist in their separation, whatever steps the assembly should take to redress their grievances: and we know not if there was an assembly since the revolution, more willing to do it than the assembly 1734, had the brethren applied to them for it, as they were urged by many to do.

The whole church had been so much alarmed by the arbitrary proceedings of former years, and the present threatened confusions, that there came up to the assembly, 1734, from all parts, and even the remotest, many pious and experienced ministers, with sincere intentions to have matters settled upon a better footing if possible. And, upon trial, the plurality of the assembly was found to be upon their side, to the great joy of the friends of peace and truth. Now, it would have exceedingly strengthened their hands in their good designs to redress grievances and advance reformation, if the four brethren had tabled their complaints before them, and represented what they would have the assembly do to satisfy them: but this they declined to do, though they were all in the town at the time. But notwithstanding of this discouragement from the brethren, and the mighty opposition of great men, ruling elders, who had a strong party in the house to support them, the assembly, in the short time they had, did all that was in their power to satisfy the friends of reformation, and to put a stop to violent settlements and the prevailing evils of the time; and they were zealously inclined to have done much more, if their time and the situation of their affairs could have allowed. Particularly, they renewed and strengthened the old acts of assembly, which were made to be barriers and fences of our constitutions against innovations; such as those made by assembly 1639, 1697, 1700, and 1705, and they rescinded the 7th act of assembly 1730, which hindered members to testify against wrong deeds of judicatories, by recording their reasons of dissent; because the said act was not made according to the foresaid rules and barrier acts. And upon the same account, they repealed the 8th act of assembly 1732, about the method of planting vacant churches; and because it gave too much countenance to violent settlements, and too much power to disaffected heritors, and was unfavourable to the liberties of the people. They reversed the settlement of a minister made by the commission, at Auchtermuchty, against the will of the congregation, and of the presbytery of the bounds; and by that decision they declared the commission's sentences reversible. Also they brought the commission under several new regulations, and discharged them to execute any settlements of churches, when the presbytery or synod of the bounds declined to do it. They empowered their commission to address the king and parliament for relief from patronages; which they did, though in vain. Also they empowered the synod of Perth and Stirling to restore the four ejected brethren to their charges and the communion of this church; which they did very soon after the assembly, without requiring any acknowledgements from them. And to facilitate their return, the assembly sincerely designed an act for removing their apprehensions, that by the late sentences passed against them, they were laid under greater restraints than before as to their ministerial freedom in testifying against wrong acts and deeds of the church: wherefore, for the satisfaction of the four brethren, and all others, the assembly made an act, declaring, "That due and regular ministerial freedom is still left entire to all ministers." They also appointed a committee to draw up an overture for an act to give directions as to the right preaching of the gospel, and to restrain the legal preaching and moral harangues of many not so agreeable thereto. This had been several times attempted in former times, but still dropped, till now that the assembly formed and referred the overture to their commission to ripen it. They also referred it to their commission to appoint a national fast, which had been long neglected, that all ranks might mourn for the prevailing evils and defections of the church and land; which they did immediately after the rising of the assembly. The assembly 1734, was a singularly faithful and reforming assembly, who did very much in a short time, against great opposition, to rectify what was wrong, and put matters on a better footing. They gave remarkable checks to violent settlements, and relief to several parishes oppressed by them; for at this assembly, methods were concerted to get sealing ordinances to those persons who submitted not to them, from other ministers they choose to apply to. As this assembly turned out one minister violently settled, so they were ready to have cast out others, if complaints had been regularly tabled before them. Their time of sitting did not allow them to consider and provide remedies for every thing amiss, and particularly for that wrong act of assembly 1733, concerning the presbytery of Dunfermline, and their behaviour toward the minister that was forcibly settled at Kinross, wherein the said assembly threatened high censures against those who refused to own him as minister of Kinross, or who admit of any of that parish to sealing ordinances without his consent. This was plainly oppression, and a very high strain of church authority, to settle ministers contrary to the rules of the word and of the church, and then oblige presbyteries to receive them, and people to submit to them. But the assembly, 1734, gave a seasonable check to such oppressive courses; and for the people of Kinross, it was afterward referred to the synod of Fife, to do what was proper for their relief, who thereupon allowed them the benefit of church privileges wherever they should think fit to ask them. And letters were written to presbyteries in other places, to indulge people in such circumstances in the like manner.

Thus did the faithful body of ministers, of whom Mr. Ebenczer Erskine spoke, use their utmost strenuous endeavours in the assembly, 1734, and in the meetings of their commission, and in after assemblies, to get the door opened, stumbling blocks removed, and the way paved for the return of their four brethren to communion with them as before. Yea, they got minister sent up year after year to London, to solicit the king and parliament for relief from patronages. And when honest ministers were in this manner travelling, sweating, labouring, and struggling, even above their strength, to get things that were wrong reformed and rectified; it was extremely afflicting to them, that the four brethren, with whom they had formerly taken sweet counsel, would by no means return to their assistance, though invited and pressed to it; but, instead of that, would be still disparaging their actings, and misconstruing their most sincere intentions. Notwithstanding of this discouragement, they continued struggling, and doing all they were able, to promote reformation in the assembly 1735 and 1736: still hoping the four brethren would bethink themselves, and cease from their dividing course. And though that honest body of ministers could not get all done which they designed, yet they got several good things carried; such as an act for better regulating the commission, and limiting their powers; an act against intrusion of ministers, and declaring it to be the principle of this church, "That none should be intruded into any parish contrary to the will of the congregation." How happy were it if this act were observed, and the foresaid principle maintained and adhered unto! Some things also were done at this time for the relief of these parishes that had been intruded upon; and an excellent overture was agreed upon, with respect to evangelical preaching, which was transmitted to presbyteries, and their consent to it was obtained ; so that after long dependence, it was got enacted by assembly 1736, May 21, act 7. in which "they recommend to ministers and preachers to warn their hearers against any thing that tends to Atheism, Deism, Arianism, Socinianism, Arminianism, Bourignianism, Popery, Superstition, Antinomianism, or any other errors: and that they insist in their sermons upon our sinful and low estate by nature, the necessity of supernatural grace, and of faith in the righteousness of Christ, without which the best works cannot please God: and that they make it the great scope of their sermons to lead sinners from a covenant of works to a covenant of grace for life and salvation, and from sin and self to precious Christ our Surety and Saviour. And as they are to press the practice of all moral duties, so also to show the nature and excellency of gospel holiness, without which no man can see the Lord: and in order to attain it, they are to show men the corruption and depravity of their nature by the fall, the natural impotence for, and aversion to, what is spiritually good; and to lead them to the true and only source of all grace and holiness, viz., union with Christ by the Holy Spirit's working faith in us, and renewing us more and more after the image of God: and that they must count all their best performances and attainments but loss and dung, in point of justification before God, and to make it their great desire only to be found in Christ their Surety, clothed in his righteousness, which is infinitely perfect and law-binding; and to make gospel subjects their main theme and study, &c. And they recommended to all professors of divinity, to use their best endeavours to have the students under their care well acquainted with the true method of preaching the gospel as directed by this act; and appoint presbyteries at their privy censures to inquire concerning the observation of this act." This is a short abstract of that excellent act, which godly ministers had been intent about for many years past, in order to give some check to the legal way of preaching, and the loose moral discourses of several preachers, to the neglect of the true preaching of "Christ and him crucified," introduced by many of the younger clergy. However long this act had been delayed, yet it was most seasonably passed in 1739, when a little before there had been a great noise of deism spreading among the students of divinity at Edinburgh; and one of them, Mr. William Nimmo, had delivered a discourse in the divinity hall, March, 1735, to the prejudice of the Christian revelation; for which he was excluded by the masters, and excommunicated by the presbytery of Edinburgh.

But seeing there is so great reason to fear that the foresaid excellent act concerning preaching, is but little noticed and observed by many, and that there is in this church and land very much of a legal or moral way of preaching, exclusive of Christ, and to the neglect of the peculiar doctrines of Christianity; and seeing the church of God, and the souls of men, appear to be in the greatest danger from this quarter; we judge it our duty to give plain and open testimony against this sort of preaching, and to declare for the true gospel-way of preaching Christ and him crucified, which ought to be the great study of every gospel-minister, as it was of the apostle Paul, 1 Cor. ii. 2.

We grant that morality, or obedience to the moral law, is an excellent thing, and absolutely necessary to be studied by every true Christian, seeing God requires it, and without morality and "true holiness no man can see the Lord;" but then it must be preached otherwise by a gospel-minister than by a moral philosopher. Why? It must flow from gospel-principles, be performed in a gospel-manner, and be pressed mainly by gospel-motives and arguments. But it must be sad indeed, when there is almost as little of Christ or an evangelical strain to be found in the sermons of Christian preachers, as in the discourses of Seneca, Plato, Socrates, or other heathen moralists.

This Christless way of preaching morality, is an inlet to deism and infidelity: for, when men are accustomed to hear moral sermons with little of Christ in them, they are apt to think there is but little difference between them and the discourses of moral heathens; and therefore they may be good enough, and win to heaven by their morality, without Christ or his righteousness. O how natural it is for men to go about to establish a righteousness of their own, with a view to be saved by it, and to neglect that new righteousness which the eternal wisdom of God hath established as alone sufficient for it! And therefore they need often to be called, after the utmost lengths in moral attainments, which are but poor and wretched at best, to renounce them all, and go to the imputed righteousness of Christ, viz., the obedience of his holy life, and his sufferings unto death for justification and salvation.

Morality is a desirable thing, when kept in its due place; but when allowed to possess the place of Christ's righteousness imputed to us, it is a soul-ruining thing, and the greatest hindrance of the soul's coming to Christ, and of its entering into heaven. God will have us come entirely off from the old bottom of a covenant of works, and from resting upon any thing done by us, or wrought in us, for acceptance with God: and look only for attaining to it by believing on whom God hath sent, and resting upon his righteousness only: nothing of ours must be added to it, otherwise we mar it. Though faith be required of us as the mean or instrument whereby we receive and apply Christ and his righteousness, and also true repentance and sincere obedience are required as evidences and fruits of our faith; yet neither faith, repentance, or obedience, nor all of them together, are any part of our justifying righteousness in the sight of God, nor are they the foundation of our acceptance, or of our title to eternal life: Christ must be all our righteousness, or nothing. So that none must think to be saved partly by his own obedience, and partly by Christ's, in order to make up his defects; but we must be saved wholly by the complete morality and obedience of Christ imputed to us. Our proud natures must be humbled and changed, and must be brought to submit to accept of an entire new clothing, instead of our own righteousness; for the glory of God will not allow the least place to this, in our justification; he will have all boasting excluded for ever.

Quest. "Seeing morality and the duties of the moral law are to be preached and pressed, in what manner then must we do it?"

Ans. If we would do it in an evangelical strain, and with success, we must, 1. Press duty as the natural and necessary fruit of faith in a crucified Christ, and love to him, who suffered thus to satisfy for our sins, to purchase to us the image of God and holiness which we had lost; and therefore let us represent the love and sufferings of Christ in a lively manner to our people, in order to lead them to abhor all known sin, and to love Christ that first loved us, and live to him that died for us; and pray earnestly for the Spirit of regeneration and sanctification which he hath purchased for us: and this is the most effectual way to promote morality and holiness among them. 2. We must set before the eyes of our people the attractive charms and beauties of a crucified Jesus in all his offices, that they may get a view of his glory, as the "chief among ten thousand, and altogether lovely," and as the "pearl of great price;" that so the Desire of all nations may come to be the desire of their hearts, and they may "count all things but dung and loss" in comparison of a crucified Christ. And as we must recommend to them to close with him as their priest and sacrifice to atone for their sins, so also to subject themselves to him as the lovely King of Zion, whose government is easy, his service pleasant, his commandments not grievous, and his rewards to obedient subjects unspeakably great. The whole precepts of the moral law are the laws of this King; but, to all his willing subjects, he makes his "yoke easy and his burden light." 3. We must enforce duties from a principle of love and of gratitude to Christ for his love. It should not be so much authority, as grateful love to Christ, that should constrain us to live to his glory, to study holiness and constant obedience to his commands: and this we should do, as we should approve ourselves to be Christ's disciples, and as we would enjoy communion with him here, and be accepted of him at his appearance to judgment. 4. We should direct our people to perform duties by the grace and strength of the Lord Jesus Christ, our Head, Surety, and Treasurer. We must be united to him by faith, as our Head of influences, and derive all our life and strength for duty out of his fulness. Alas! this direction is little minded by many of our moral preachers, whose discourses generally seem to proceed upon the supposition of the strength of our natural powers, as if we had no natural impotence or enmity to what is good, nor been at all disabled by the fall. 5. We must persuade men to leave sin, and perform duty, by the terrors of Christ's coming to judgment, and the wrath of the Lamb, that will then be intolerable to all who slight his grace and disobey his laws. 6. When we press duties, let us put our hearers in mind, that all our duties and good works have no worth or merit before God; they are not our justifying righteousness; they are only accepted of God through the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ: and that, after we have done all, we must say we are but unprofitable servants; and our main desire is to be found in Christ, not having our own righteousness, which is but as filthy rags, and cannot be any screen or covert to us before God. 7. Let us instruct our people, that though Christianity enforces morality by the strongest arguments, yet unregenerate morality will never please God. Till the heart be renewed, and the soul grafted into Christ the true Vine, the fruit will be always sour and unpleasant to God. A moral man, though he profess himself a Christian, is not really so, unless he be united to Christ, and look for daily influences from him to perform duties, and to the righteousness of Christ to cover him and all his duties: and be still saying, Though I could perform never so many duties, I should be lost and undone for ever, if it were not for the righteousness and mediation of Christ my Surety and Saviour, in whom is all my hope and trust. For all true holiness and acceptable morality is the proper result of the soul's union with the holy Jesus our living Head, who is the first and immediate receptacle of the Holy Spirit, and of all sanctifying influences for the use of his members; and out of Christ's fulness we must by faith receive them for our sanctification.

Let us make every subject we insist on point to Christ. If we discourse upon the attributes of God, let us consider them as they shine forth in Christ and his glorious undertaking: if upon the blessings and promises of the gospel, let us consider them as the purchase of Christ's blood: if on the providence of God, let us mind that the administration is put into Christ's hands, and he is Head over all things for the church: if we exhort to repentance and mourning for sin, let us direct our hearers to look to him whom they have pierced: if to prayer, let us direct them to look to Christ, by whom only they can have access and success in this duty.

O how happy were it both for us and our hearers, if we thus reduced every thing to Christ, and made him the main subject of all our sermons; and if the scope of them all were to persuade sinners to come to Christ, and all that profess him to live by faith on him, and make daily use of him! To this glorious person did all the prophets of the Old Testament give witness, and much more should all the ministers of the New.

Now, this way of preaching is surely the most excellent, and preferable to any other way. Why? 1. The preaching of Christ crucified is the mean which God hath appointed for gathering in elect sinners to himself, and to which he promises his blessing. Hence it is that Paul saith, God makes the preaching of the cross and of Christ crucified the power of God to them who are called: and though natural men count this way of preaching foolishness, yet it pleases God by this way "to save them that believe," 1 Cor. i. 18, 21, 24.

2. It was by this way of preaching among the Corinthians, that the apostle Paul had such wonderful success in bringing them to Christ, 1 Cor. ii. 2. It was when Peter preached a crucified Jesus and the peculiar doctrines of Christianity to the people, that the Holy Ghost fell on them, and converted multitudes of them; as Luke observes several times, Acts ii. 36, 37; x. 43, 44. It was not when he was preaching morality that the Spirit descended and gave success to the word. Also he observes, when these preachers from Cyprus preached the Lord Jesus to the people of Antioch, "the hand of the Lord was with them, and a great number believed, and turned to the Lord," Acts xi. 20, 21.

3. It is the preaching of a crucified Christ that God in his wisdom hath pitched upon as the way to reform men from their vices, and to bring in virtue, godliness and good order into nations, cities, and congregations. The heathen philosophers and wise men had, for some thousands of years, tried all means which the powers of nature or reason could afford, to bring men to God and virtue, but in vain; for they remained still ignorant of God, and ran farther away from him into all abominable impieties. Likewise in many places there are several masters of reason and eloquence, who excel in a sort of rational and moral way of preaching, exclusive of Christ; but what success have they in it for converting souls? Alas! their people still sink in vice and corruption; all their fine reasonings cannot change the perverse will of one sinner. They may, perhaps, entertain two or three, or a few of their audience, who have a taste of the beauties of fine reasoning; but the body of the congregation remain untouched and asleep, so that all they hear is lost to them. Surely the value and usefulness of things are to be reckoned from their capacity and fitness to answer the end they are designed for: now the end of preaching is to win souls to Christ, so that these sermons are the most excellent that serve this design most: and those, we see, are the sermons which are fullest of Christ. Alas! Christless moral sermons bring few off from their vices to the practice of morality, and far fewer into Christ. Such a way of preaching is a longsome unsuccessful method to reclaim and reform the vicious: whereas the short and effectual way to reform sinners, and make them moral, is to preach Christ to them; if you bring them to Jesus, you turn them from all their sins, and make them moral at once, yea, inwardly holy, which is more. O then, let us preach Christ above all things!

4. If we look through the world, we will find it is only those ministers who preach Christ most, who have most success; and that the life and spirit of true religion rises or falls among a people, according as a crucified Redeemer is faithfully preached among them or not. And those acquainted with church-history observe, that when God is about to leave a people, and his glory to depart from his house, he usually gives them up to a lifeless and formal ministry, who neglect the preaching of Christ and the peculiar doctrines of the gospel, such as free justification by the righteousness of Christ, and inward regeneration by the Spirit of Christ; and do not inform their people that it is from a crucified Jesus the virtue must come for breaking the power of sin in the soul, and subduing it to God. No wonder our flocks look poor and lean, when we take no care to lead them into these green pastures of evangelical truths, but set before them the dry insipid stuff of a heathenish morality, which can never feed them nor keep them in good liking! How can we expect assistance from Jesus Christ in our work, or the influences of his Spirit in preaching, upon which all our success depends, when we take no more notice of Christ in our sermons than the moral philosophers among the heathens? Woe will be to this national church, if such a way of preaching shall prevail in it, notwithstanding of the foresaid act of assembly, and a sound Confession of Faith, which all ministers subscribe to. God forbid that the church of Scotland become ever like the church of England in this respect, who subscribe to sound articles of doctrine, and never mind them more afterwards.

Likewise, as by the word of God ministers are bound to separate between the precious and the vile, the clean and the unclean, the sincere and the formalist; so, by the foresaid act, 1736, concerning preaching, all ministers are appointed, in application of their sermons, to endeavour rightly to divide the word of truth, speaking distinctly to the various cases of their hearers, whether converted or unconverted, &c. Alas! it is to be feared, the making of this difference is too much neglected by many, both in dispensing the word and sacraments.

These and several other good things, did the assembly, 1736, but it is to be regretted they were not steady and uniform in their proceedings; for, while they discouraged and stopped some intrusions, they encouraged others: and they gave no small occasion of offence by their management in the affair of professor Campbell at St. Andrews, who had vented several dangerous errors in his writings, such as his Oratoria Academica, his Inquiry into the Original of Moral Virtue, his Discourse concerning Enthusiasm, &c. wherein he asserts, "That men, by their natural powers, without revelation, cannot find out the being of a God: that the law of nature is sufficient to guide rational minds to happiness: that self-love, interest, or pleasure, is the sole principle and motive of all virtuous and religious actions: that Christ's disciples had no notion of his divinity before his resurrection, and before that they expected nothing from him but a worldly kingdom; and during the interval between his death and resurrection, they looked on him as an impostor." Likewise, while speaking against enthusiasts, he utters several things very disparaging and reproachful to the work of the Holy Spirit upon the souls of the people of God. These errors were brought before the assembly, 1735, who referred them to their commission; and they appointed a committee to consider them, and prepare their report to the next assembly. Mr. Campbell laboured to give in sound and orthodox explications of these his positions, which the committee brought before the assembly, 1736, with their remarks and censures upon them, and the recommendations they judged fit to be given him. The assembly, upon hearing Mr. Campbell at great length, were of opinion, that the committee's examining and stating the matter as they had done, was sufficient to caution against the errors charged upon Mr. Campbell, without giving any judgment or formal sentence upon the committee's report; only they recommended to him not to use doubtful expressions or propositions, which may lead his hearers or readers into error. This issue of the process many, in the assembly and out of it, were highly dissatisfied with, judging that Mr. Campbell justly deserved a sharp rebuke for the many incautious and unsound expressions he hath in his writings, however orthodox his explications might be: and with these we do heartily join.

Though the assembly gave no judgment upon Mr. Campbell's positions or explications, yet severals would charge the assembly with adopting one of his errors; because, when he explained his positions concerning self-love, he declared he meant no more but "that our delight in the honour and glory of God was the chief motive of all virtuous and religious actions." Now, say they, this delight is the same with the self-love, or the desire of our own happiness, which is the error charged on him: yet the assembly dismissed him without quarreling it. But this should be looked upon as a pure oversight in the assembly, through their not adverting to the import of the word delight, but taking "delight in the glory of God," for the same with "regard to the glory of God," because of their affinity. For when assembly 1737 was informed that severals had taken offence, as if the assembly 1736 had adopted some of Mr. Campbell's offensive expressions on the head of self-love, they vindicated this church from that charge, by making an act, declaring that they stedfastly adhere to the doctrine expressed in our standards on that head, particularly in the answer to that question in our Larger and Shorter Catechisms, What is the chief end of man?

In the year 1735, there was an essay made by an unknown hand to alter our Shorter Catechism, which was printed at London, under the title of The Assembly's Shorter Catechism Revised, and rendered fitter for General Use. The reviser casts it into such a mould, as to make it agree with Arian, Socinian, Popish, and Arminian schemes of doctrine. As soon as it was publicly known in Scotland, the commission took it under their consideration, as the synod of Lothian had done before them, and passed an act condemning it, and gave warning about it to all the presbyteries in this church, that they might be on their guard against the spreading and infection thereof. And would to God that our assemblies had, in like manner, given plain and faithful warning to all the corners and members of this church, against professor Simson and professor Campbell's errors, and others which have been vented and spread in this church, and shewn to them their inconsistency with the word of God, and our Confession of Faith and Catechisms! May God in his infinite mercy revive our zeal for all the truths therein contained, and against all sorts of error opposite thereto!

After all, it is to be regretted that the national church was not duly humbled by all these awful rebukes for her manifold defections, and particularly for disregarding Christ's flock in settlements; neither did she amend her ways and doings, and turn to the Lord: wherefore we find the hand of the Lord stretched out against her still, and a new sharp trial carved out for her from a quarter that none could have expected. One captain Porteous, that had been condemned to die for several murders, having obtained a reprieve by the interest of some great men, the mob rose up notwithstanding, and executed him at Edinburgh, the 7th of September, 1736. The king and parliament resented this affront so highly, that they framed a strange and extraordinary act for discovering the actors: and because some of the church's enemies suggested, without any ground, that the Scottish clergy, at least a set of them, encouraged the people in such mobbish actions, they appointed all the ministers of Scotland to read the said act in time of divine service in their churches every first Sabbath in the month for a whole year, beginning in August, 1737: and the penalty for the first neglect of reading it was, that "they shall be declared incapable of sitting or voting in any church judicatory; and this was to be executed against them by the civil judges in Scotland. The most part of ministers in many synods and presbyteries, though they scrupled not to condemn the outrageous insult of the mob as murder, yet they had not freedom to read the said act, because they judged the penalty foresaid to be properly a church censure, seeing by it ministers would be divested of the power of church government and discipline, which is given them by the Lord Jesus Christ the Head of the church, and is as essential to their office as preaching or dispensing the sacrament. Now, for the civil magistrate to assume the power of the keys, or of inflicting church censures, which Christ hath put in the hands of his own officers, they judged a manifest encroachment upon Christ's Headship over his church, and contrary to the word of God and the Confession of Faith they had subscribed, chap. 30. par. 1, 2. and chap. 23, 3. And for ministers to become magistrates' heralds, to proclaim this law on the Lord's day, in such a solemn manner, would be an homologating of this encroachment, and a consenting to this Erastian power of the magistrate. Likewise they judged to approve or concur with a law so prejudicial to the doctrine and discipline of this church, as established by law civil and ecclesiastical, would be to give up with fundamental securities, and act contrary to the solemn engagements ministers come under to maintain the doctrine and discipline of this church, and do nothing prejudicial thereto. Besides, they did not think it agreeable to the office of those who were "ambassadors of the gospel of peace," to become heralds or executors of this or any sanguinary law; especially when they apprehended there were several things in it inconsistent with justice and equity, besides the Erastian penalty aforementioned. These and other arguments, set in a clear light in several pamphlets published at that time, determined us to join with those who bore testimony against the reading of the foresaid act, and to run the hazard of all its penalties. And we wish the light of all the ministers of Scotland had been the same with ours in this matter, which would have prevented much division and stumbling that different practices have occasioned.

But yet we must do justice to those of a different light, so far as to own, that there were several pious and conscientious ministers who read this act, because of the quite different view they had of it from those who refused it: and seeing by the whole tenor of their lives and actions, it appears they have acted uprightly and honestly in other matters, we are in charity bound to think they acted sincerely in this also. Their reasons for reading were: a sinful penalty in the act should not hinder their reading those parts of the act which might be lawful; and they judged they were bound to read some parts of it, to warn their people of the danger of harbouring or succouring the rioters. And they did not look on the penalty scrupled at as any church censure, or Erastian encroachment upon Christ's Headship; and, as they judged, no more was meant by it, but that the non-readers should forfeit the magistrate's protection in sitting in church-courts: and that the magistrate, without assuming the power of the keys, might, by his civil power as a magistrate, exclude or render ministers incapable of sitting in church-courts, by confining or banishing them. And they sincerely declare, that, if they had thought their reading of that act had in the least wronged the Headship of the King of Zion, they would rather have suffered the loss of their stipends, or any thing else. Now charity obligeth us to believe pious men to be ingenuous in such declarations.

But, alas! notwithstanding of all these shaking dispensations, the church was not brought to a right sense of her sins and defections; and therefore the Lord's controversy with her was not at an end: for we find the assembly 1738 continuing in former steps, and giving new offence to many in the church, by another decision in a process of error. The magistrates and town-council of Edinburgh having chosen Mr. William Wishart, a minister at London, to be principal to their college, and having got a call to him also to be one of the ministers of the city, the presbytery of Edinburgh refused to concur with the said call, and charged him with venting several erroneous propositions in two of his printed sermons, with respect to the power and office of the magistrate in religious matters, the liberty of Christian subjects, the subscribing of Confessions, the education of children, the influence of arguments taken from the awe of future rewards and punishments, his excessive charity to heathens and others who reject the gospel-offers and institutions, and the sinful and corrupt state of all men from their birth, &c. This affair being brought by appeals to the general assembly, and Mr. Wishart having made his explanations, and given in a subscribed declaration of his adhering to the Confession of Faith, and the particular articles of it which his propositions seemed to oppose, and also of his disclaiming all errors whatsoever, whether charged upon him in the presbytery's articles or not, that are contrary to the Confession of Faith, or any article of it; the assembly thereupon assolized Mr. Wishart from the process against him, and also they sustained his call to be one of the ministers of Edinburgh, and appointed the presbytery to admit him as such.

Here we cannot but testify against such soft proceedings, whether in the case of professor Campbell, doctor Wishart, or others processed for error; seeing we judge it far from being sufficient to terminate a process for error, or to vindicate persons accused of it, that they explain their words into a sound and orthodox sense, though perhaps contrary to the obvious meaning of them, according to the plain and ordinary acceptance of words; or that they profess their adherence to our Confession of Faith, and its articles, which their tenets are thought to contradict. For a heretic, when in hazard of censure, may make a shift to put an orthodox sense upon his words, if that will save him, though it should be quite contrary to the common sense and meaning of them; and he may declare his owning the words of our Confession of Faith, and yet affix a sense and meaning to them directly opposite to the known sentiments and doctrine of this church: so that it is plain, such a loose superficial way of managing a process for error, is not an effectual way to suppress it. Wherefore we think it further necessary for that end, that those who are processed for venting error or unsound propositions, should particularly and directly renounce the erroneous tenets and principles charged upon them, upon account of their words, and the unsound sense which they naturally convey; and that they be at least rebuked for departing from the form of sound words contained in the word of God, and our standards, which are framed agreeable thereunto.

We see it is God's express command concerning such men, Titus i. 13, "Wherefore rebuke them sharply, that they may be sound in the faith." Sharp rebukes preserve soundness, but easy absolutions encourage error. No sooner is Dr. Wishart assolized, but he falls a recommending and prefacing books of bad character, such as Dr. Whitehead's sermons, that savour of Socinianism, as the reverend Mr. Bisset of Aberdeen makes appear in a letter he hath lately published. Ah! how low must the case of this poor church be, when the head of the most frequented college in Scotland recommends such books impun for college-students and preachers to form upon!

These and other proceedings of our assemblies were very grievous to many worthy ministers and others in this church; and the four seceding brethren before mentioned, with other four, viz., Messrs. Nairn, R. Erskine, Mair, and Thomson, who afterwards joined them, took occasion from such actings, to carry their secession and separation to very great heights, by licensing preachers, invading parishes, and preaching up separation every where, not sparing their best friends, nor those who dissented from the evils of the time, and took all regular methods to testify against them; but charging the whole ministry with very black things. They also framed an act and testimony of many sheets, with very much of church authority in it, which they required all their followers to adhere to. Though we own there were many good things in it, yet there were also many mistakes in it, and misrepresentation of facts, very harsh and unsuitable expressions, and also bitter reflections against their brethren, and even our worthy forefathers, &c. These things being laid before the assembly, they appointed the ministers of the presbyteries and synods where the said brethren reside, to be at all pains, by conference, and other gentle means of persuasion, to reclaim them; and to report their diligence to the commission, whom they empowered, if they should see cause, to take all proper steps to sist the said eight brethren before the assembly 1739. Accordingly, these eight brethren were libelled and cited to the said assembly, who all compeared before them in the capacity of a constitute judicatory; and, instead of answering to their libel, they, by their moderator, read an act of their court, condemning the judicatories of the national church as not being lawful courts of Christ, and declining all their authority and jurisdiction over them. Upon which they withdrew, and attended the assembly no more. Whereupon the assembly passed an act concerning them, declaring, "That for their declinature, contempt, and schismatical courses, contrary to their vows, and for the many groundless and calumnious reflections which they have cast on the church and her judicatories, they deserve deposition: but that they have resolved to forbear them another year, to give them further time to bethink themselves, and return to their duty; and they appointed them to be cited to the next assembly, 1740."

Being cited accordingly, and not compearing, the assembly 1740 proceeded to depose the whole eight brethren. But there having been debates about wording the sentence, and different senses put on it, we must look to the words themselves, which are, "They depose them from the office of the holy ministry, prohibiting them to exercise the same within this church." And we must say, we are sorry to see a sentence of this sort so ambiguous. If these words, "Within this church," be connected with the word "depose," as well as with the word "prohibit," they mean no more but that they depose them from being ministers of this church; and many who voted it, say they meant no more; so that, in this sense, the sentence is only a loosing of their relation from the national church; which the brethren themselves had done in effect, by their secession from her, by their renouncing all her authority and jurisdiction, and refusing all communion with any of her ministers. But, on the other hand, if the words "within this church" be not connected with the word "depose," then the assembly meant to depose them "simpliciter" from the office of the ministry itself: and in this sense many members understood the sentence; and therefore a good many voted against it, and dissented from it. For though they did not approve of their wild divisive practices, yet they had not freedom to unminister them, seeing they looked upon them as pious, orthodox Presbyterian ministers, who had been useful in the church, and might still be useful in preaching Christ to lost perishing sinners. And, if the sentence be taken up in this sense, we join with those who testified against it; in regard we think the world cannot easily spare any of these ministers who are upright and zealous in preaching a crucified Jesus to fallen men, especially at a time when Deism and dry moral discourses are like to thrust out true Christianity. Neither do we think it was time for the church to proceed to censure the brethren, till once they had done all they could to remove the evils and redress the grievances which were the grounds of their separation, and thereby had made them inexcusable in their schism; which, alas! is far from being done. And as for the brethren's licensing of preachers, which is one article of their libel, the assembly and commission might prevent that, if they pleased to observe our good rules, and particularly the 14th act of assembly 1736, against intrusions; seeing it is manifest, that, by every new intrusion and forced settlement which they make, they give encouragement to the brethren to erect a new tent, and license a new preacher; and till such time as they shall cease from the one, they cannot well expect the brethren will cease from the other. And with respect to several other parts and articles of their libel, we think them too general, and no ways so particular, nor duly laid, as ought to have been in a process of this kind; and some of the most material things charged against the brethren are left out.

But as we cannot justify the assembly in their conduct, so neither can we vindicate the brethren in theirs. And seeing we proposed in this performance to give a fair and impartial testimony against the defections and evils of the time, whether upon one side or another, we shall briefly mention some of our seceding brethren's defections and strayings from the good old paths; which they have been led into, partly by their own precipitancy and misguided zeal, and partly by the headstrong humours of their followers: Such as,

1. Their unprecedented secession which they have made from their mother-church, and the lamentable schism they have begun and carried on with so much heat and uncharitableness, when they were under no necessity of going into any sinful terms of communion, and when they were joined with a body of faithful ministers who witnessed against the evils complained of, as well as they. Our histories assure us, that such a schismatical course is contrary to what was the approved judgment and practice of our reforming ancestors, for above an hundred years after our reformation from Popery, though sometimes they had greater provocation to it than our seceding brethren had.

2. They both seceded, and constituted themselves into a presbytery for the exercise of discipline and government through the whole national church, without consulting with their brethren and fathers in it, whom they then owned to be a numerous body of faithful ministers; though they could not but foresee that the said body of ministers, with their flocks, would be much affected, nay, distressed, shaken, perplexed, and rent, by such singular and extraordinary steps as they were taking.

3. Their irreverent and disrespectful carriage towards their mother-church, to whom they had solemnly vowed submission; as appears in their Declinature, wherein they disown all her authority and jurisdiction over them, and pronounced judicially a sentence of their newly erected presbytery against the general assembly, and all the other judicatories of the church, finding and declaring that they are not lawful courts of Christ; which sentence they presumed formally to intimate in face of the general assembly, by their moderator, before many witnesses, May 17th, 1739. They ought to have remembered, that the laws both of God and man highly resent children's beating, cursing, or maltreating their mother, even when she is somewhat severe and out of her duty to them; and that it is necessary that zeal should be attended with meekness, courteousness, and humbleness of mind. Surely such a declinature, and such a sentence as theirs, would seem to import no less than the unchurching of the whole church, and unministering her whole ministry, faithful body and all, as if they were all given up to some dreadful apostacy or fundamental errors. Now, we are pretty sure there are few judicious orthodox divines in the world that will adventure to unchurch the church of Scotland, or declare her no church of Christ, for all the saints she hath. They have owned others as the churches of Christ, who have been as corrupt as she, if not more. Nay, the glorious Head of the church, the best Judge, hath owned some no less corrupt, as "golden candlesticks," walked in them and held communion with them; such as the church of Corinth, some of the churches of Asia, Galatia, and other places. And is it thank-worthy in any of the members to outrun the Head, or to be more forward to unchurch his churches, or to unminister his ministers, than what he himself inclines to be?

4. We cannot justify the brethren in refusing to return to assist those whom they owned to be a body of faithful ministers, to promote a work of reformation; when, by a surprising providence, they had got the upper-hand in the assembly 1734, and were doing all they could to remove the evils they complained of, and had the door opened for them, and the act 1732 repealed, which was the great occasion of their protesting and seceding; and were most willing to do every thing in their power to satisfy them and all the friends of reformation. But after they had continued for two or three years to struggle even above their strength, and thereby had got many good things done, still hoping their brethren would return to their assistance; they were grievously discouraged when they saw them still bent upon their begun schism, so as to set at nought all they had been doing, and misconstruct their most honest designs; yea, they were at length so disheartened by their measures, that many of them gave over travelling, and attending the assemblies, who thereupon, alas! soon returned to their old bias. So that it is manifest the brethren's wilfulness in their dividing way, put a stop to a begun national reformation, which, if they had favoured and struck in with, might have been advanced very far, through the blessing of God, and many dismal consequences of their schism prevented.

5. We must disapprove the brethren in seceding not only from the church, but also from their old Christian temper and disposition, and from that royal law of love and charity which they once preached up: this appears in their excluding from the room they once had in their charity and communion, all their old friends and acquaintances, though never so sound and pious, or willing to spend or be spent for Christ and souls, if they have not light to secede and join with them. Whatever esteem of them they had before, they must now no longer employ them, hear them, nor preach for them. Now, why should they treat the body of faithful ministers they once took sweet counsel with, as if they were gross apostates, when it is notorious they continue the very same men they were before, when the brethren sat with them in judicatories? They still witness and contend for reformation principles as well as they; they gave testimony against licensing or ordaining corrupt men, and against all errors and intrusions; against countenancing patronages, and accepting presentations; against all encroachments made upon the rights of the church and Christian people, and upon the Headship of Christ over the church; against the preaching up a sort of heathen morality, and the neglect of the true preaching of Christ and gospel holiness, &c. Now, what must be the reason for the brethren's separating and departing from their old friends, as if they were become Papists or Mahometans? Is it a good reason, because they continue to witness against the evils of the time in the judicatories as they did before, and not in conjunction with the eight seceders? Why must it now become such a deadly sin for worthy men to go with Joseph and Nicodemus to backsliding judicatories, to plead with their mother, to testify against corruptions, to do all they can to hold out English prelacy and ceremonies, and maintain the national establishment of presbytery, and a sound Confession of Faith, and to strive to do all the good in their power, while waiting for better times, when God will open the eyes of men to see the evil of their ways? Now, when honest men think these ends may be better answered by going to judicatories than by joining a few seceders, ought not their brethren to forbear them, and allow them the same place in their charity and communion they had before?

6. We cannot approve of their marking so narrowly the failings, mistakes, and wrong steps of their sincere godly brethren, as they do: and instead of covering and forgiving their weaknesses, as Christ enjoins, aggravating and magnifying them so as to make every mistake a dangerous error and defection; and not only doing this in private conversation, but going to the pulpit, and proclaiming them at times of greatest concourse, such as sacrament occasions, which should be feasts of love and charity among Christians, and not engines of strife and debate. Such an uncharitable course we judge the ready way to mar the usefulness of many of Christ's faithful servants in his vineyard, tending both to break their ministry, and break their hearts at once; to scatter their poor flocks, and do great harm to many precious souls.

7. Likewise we must witness against their exciting and stirring up poor people plainly and directly to leave their godly pastors, by whom many of them have been brought to Christ; and doing so at the very time while they are feeding and profiting under their ministry; and for no other reason but because these ministers have not freedom to join in their secession and testimony, &c., yea, persuading the people to leave these, and come to them, as they would not fall under the curse of Meroz, &c., and doing this both when they preach at home, and when they invade the parishes of others abroad. We cannot but testify against such flock-scattering doctrines and practices, as most sinful; and judge it to be a counterfeiting of our Lord's words, "He that despiseth you despiseth me," and also great cruelty to go and pluck weak children from the breasts, while sucking strength and nourishment from pure ordinances, and to tell them, as seceders do, that some few occasional meals, like their itinerant sermons, will be better for them, though perhaps they are not so good as their daily fare. This doctrine tends to ruin souls, by fostering ignorance, error, infidelity, looseness, carnality, worldliness, Sabbath-breaking, and all sorts of profanity through the land; for thus many thousands of ignorant Christless souls, if they obey them, must sit at home on the Lord's day, and live without the gospel, except when they get a transient sermon of this kind now and then from a seceder.

8. We must also bear witness against the brethren narrowing the terms both of ministerial and of Christian communion, so as no reformed church ever did. (1.) As to ministerial, they have come the length to refuse communion with the most strict and holy ministers in Scotland, if he does not secede and approve of their long act and testimony, notwithstanding of the many visible blemishes that are in it. And this they do in contradiction to their protestation at their first secession, Nov. 16th, 1733, by which they profess still to hold communion with all true Presbyterians, who groan under the evils of the time, and wrestle against them: and again, they say the same in their first testimony, page 95. But they continue short while in that moderate disposition; for they soon came to refuse communion with all ministers but those of their own presbytery. (2.) As to Christian communion, they go a prodigious length in excommunicating from the Lord's table all who hear or communicate with any other ministers, although these ministers might possibly be the instruments of their conversion, and signally blessed to them; and men upon whom they can charge no defection or fault, but their not seceding from the church, and acceding to their long testimony in all points. Surely, for men to prescribe such new terms of communion to God's children before they can get their bread, terms not appointed by the Head, is both to encroach upon the Headship of Jesus Christ, and break in upon that article of our Creed, "The communion of saints."

9. We must regret their casting slanders on their worthy ancestors, and on their mother-church, in their act and testimony, and other papers emitted or adopted by them; particularly by alleging, that the assembly 1690, which consisted of many confessors and old sufferers, "made no particular acknowledgment of the backslidings of the land under prelacy; and that they declared the perfidious prelates were not to be deposed for their treacherous defections: that the parliament which met at that time imposed the oath of allegiance, to exclude the oath of the covenant: that professor Simson and professor Campbell's errors, and those favoured by the Assembly's Shorter Catechism revised, have overspread this church like a flood: that the judicatories have overturned the foundations of the doctrine and government of Christ's church: that they have subverted both her doctrine and worship: that they have done what in them lay to pull the crown off Christ's head: that they have refused to give him the glory of his supreme Deity, and involved themselves in denying the Son of God, which is one special mark of antichrist: they have made sinful terms of communion," &c. For all which, see Testimony, first edit. pages 51, 53, 59, 105, 109, 144, 145, 148, besides others of their papers. These are but a sample of the many false aspersions contained in their writings, besides those which they daily cast upon their brethren in their sermons. Alas! that brethren, who are concerned for the same gospel-interest, should take such methods to slander their own mother's sons, to discredit their persons and blast their ministry; especially when God is pleased to countenance several of them remarkably in their work. There are indeed many evils in the national church; but it is sinful to calumniate her, and make her defections greater than they are.

occasioned through their intemperate party zeal; we still have regard to several of them, as good men upon the main, and useful preachers of a crucified Jesus; and upon that account, we wish well to them; not doubting but they have as good title to our charity as the Donatists and Novatians of old, and the Brownists and M^cMillanites of later years. And we pray God to incline their hearts to unite with other godly ministers.

As we have thus endeavoured to give our impartial testimony against the defections and wrong steps of the national church, and likewise of those who have of late separated from her; so we also bear our testimony against the defections of the Episcopal clergy in meeting-houses through Scotland. Ah, how wofully have they degenerated from the principles and practice of their fathers! Of old, their fathers did not differ much from the established church-government, their doctrine and worship being very much the same: but now they are generally said to be Arminian and erroneous in their doctrine. And upon our incorporating union with England, and the toleration in 1712, they changed their way of worship, and fell in with the English service and ceremonies, which their fathers would never receive, and which many Presbyterian writers have refuted to excellent purpose. Though this was a very great and remarkable change in the Scottish Episcopal clergy, yet now it appears to have been introductive to a greater: for, being strongly attached to Jacobite principles and a Popish pretender, they were thereby induced to entertain favourable thoughts of other Popish superstitions and errors, which at length many of them began to vent and stand up for: such as, a middle state for souls after death, and prayers for the dead: The making the sacrament of the Lord's supper a proper sacrifice or propitiatory oblation for sin, and mixing the sacramental wine with water: Pleading for the necessity of absolution by a priest, and confession of sin to him, in order to the forgiveness of sin: the anointing with oil in baptism and other cases: the necessity of Episcopal ordination and baptism to salvation: and the practice of bowing towards the altar, and at the name of Jesus, with other Popish practices, for which they have no foundation or warrant in the bible, but to the contrary. Wherefore they do not much encourage their people to read the Scriptures, unless it be with such commentaries as they recommend to them; telling them that they must only receive the sense and meaning of the Scriptures from the church or clergy, and they must have a special regard to ancient liturgies, fathers, councils, traditions, &c. And because the English prayer-book doth not favour some of their new usages, they would have some places of it altered, or a new liturgy composed. In the prayers for the church, they leave out the words in the English liturgy, church militant here in earth, to favour prayers for the dead; and also they begin to favour the Arians, by passing over the Athanasian Creed in their public worship. These innovations have occasioned in several places very great divisions both among the clergy and people: but still the innovating clergy gain ground against those who are more orthodox: and when they find people offended, or ready to leave them, upon account of their innovations, they either deny them, or artfully palliate them, until they get the people, who are but too tractable, reconciled to them; and thus they are gradually drawing nearer to the superstitions and idolatry of Rome from time to time. Yea, some of them begin to preface and recommend Popish books, which contain devotions and prayers to the Virgin Mary, and to the saints besides other errors. May the Lord stop their career, and preserve the land from an inundation of Popery, that antichristian, tyrannical, bloody, blasphemous, idolatrous, and damnable religion!

In such a time of general defection and degeneracy in this and other churches, when infidelity, error, superstition, lukewarmness, deadness, carnality, profaneness, schism, and divisions were on the growing hand; what might have been expected from a holy and just God, thus dreadfully provoked, but that he would remove our candlestick out of its place, or come against us with some desolating judgment? But, behold! instead thereof, God is pleased to glorify his sovereign mercy and free grace in pitying his forlorn remnant, and to arise and maintain his own cause, by pouring out his Spirit from on high in several parts, to renew the decayed face of the earth. Amazing goodness! when the enemy was coming in as an overflowing flood, and God in justice might have given us all up for a prey to him, the Spirit of God was pleased to lift up a standard against him in a very surprising manner, for reviving his own work in many places through the world, and in this land in particular.

In or about the years 1732 or 1733, the Lord was pleased to pour out his Spirit upon the people of Saltsburg in Germany, who were living in Popish darkness, in a most uncommon manner; so that above twenty thousand of them, merely by reading the bible, which they made a shift to get in their own language, were determined to throw off Popery, and embrace the reformed religion; yea, and to become so very zealous for the truth and gospel of Jesus Christ, as to be willing to suffer the loss of all things in the world, and actually to forsake their houses, lands, goods, and relations, that they might enjoy the pure preaching of the gospel. And O with what earnestness and tears in their eyes did they beseech Protestant ministers to preach to them in the places where they, when banished from their own country, came in different bodies ! For it pleased the Lord to stir up Protestant princes and states to receive them, and provide for them, in many different places.

Near to the same time, or about the year 1735 or 1736, the Lord poured out his Spirit on many in Moravia, another country in Germany, to enlighten them in the knowledge of Jesus Christ, and inspire them with extraordinary zeal to propagate it to others; insomuch that Count Zinzendorf, bishop of the Moravian church, hath sent forth his missionaries to preach the gospel, not only in Germany and other parts of Europe, but in many places of the heathen world, where they call the Indians, the negroes, the Hottentots, and Greenlanders, to the knowledge of a crucified Christ; and we are told of the great success of their ministry: and the Count himself travels and preaches in very many different and remote places; though it is matter of regret to hear that these zealous preachers of Christ are tainted with several errors; and so indeed were several of our reformers at the first. May the Lord purge them from all error whatsoever.

Likewise, about the year 1736, there was a marvellous outpouring of the Spirit upon the people of Northampton in New England, and neighbouring places, where God displayed the riches of his grace, and the power of his Spirit, in the wonderful conversion of several hundreds in a short time, under the ministry of Mr. Jonathan Edwards and others there. O how glorious was that work ! as appears by the narrative then published of it.

At the very same time, the Lord was pleased to raise up and qualify a number of students at the college of Oxford, in our neighbour nation of England, to be instruments of much good, although not altogether purged from the corruptions of that land. They joined in a religious society, wherein they agreed upon certain methods and rules for spending their time in fasting, praying, communicating, visiting the sick and the prisoners, instructing the ignorant, &c. and hence they were called Methodists. And being afterwards ordained to the ministry, they preached with great warmth, choosing subjects very much neglected in that church, such as the doctrine of grace, of justification by faith in the righteousness of Christ; of original sin and the corruption of our nature, of the nature and necessity of regeneration, and the new birth, &c. These doctrines being new, they were much admired and followed wherever they preached: they used also a good deal of freedom in speaking against the loose and negligent clergy, for which they were at length denied the use of churches; whereupon they went and preached in the fields, in houses, and wherever they might have access, collecting money for erecting schools, hospitals, and other pious uses; travelling to many places, and preaching every day, and several times in one day, having many thousands to hear them in London, Bristol, Gloucester, through Wales, and very many places in England. Many of their hearers were brought under great impressions, shedding tears, and crying out, "What shall we do to be saved?" And great changes were made upon very profligate persons, and upon several who went to scoff and ridicule them. Also many of the clergy were quickened to their work by them.

In the year 1740, Mr. Whitefield, one of the foresaid Methodists, went to New England, and Mr. Gilbert Tennent after him, where they preached some months, two or three times every day, with singular and extraordinary success, the people being greatly awakened, especially by Mr. Tennent's preaching; so that there followed a remarkable change upon their lives, and a wonderful revival and appearance of religion through all that country for several years. The like also was very observable in Pennsylvania, and the Jerseys, about the same time. It is to be regretted, that the work began to be much clouded by some zealous but imprudent ministers, and a set of illiterate exhorters, who went through the country preaching and venting errors, and sometimes very rash censures against their brethren, and some of them pretended to visions, prophecy, and great attainments, and running into several extravagances; upon which account some have endeavoured to expose the whole work as enthusiasm and delusion. But it being Satan's ordinary way, when he sees Christ's kingdom advancing in a place, to exert himself to bring a reproach upon religion, by leading some zealous professors into errors and disorders; this can prove no more against the work in general, than the delusions of the Anabaptists and Fifth-monarchy-men did against the reformation. But these clouds did not long continue.

Likewise, in the year 1740, and afterwards, in Scotland, even amidst our backslidings and divisions, in some parts promising tokens began to appear of a revival of Christianity: for in Edinburgh and elsewhere, some new praying societies were set up, and sundry students associated with them, which gave hopes of a further reviving; and for this many prayers were put up through the land, and that a good time before Mr. Whitefield came to Scotland, which was in the end of July, 1741, where he abode some time, and preached many awakening sermons in Edinburgh, Glasgöw, and other places.

In Cambuslang, a small parish four miles from Glasgow, there were several praying societies, who spent much time in prayers and wrestling with God, especially in Feb. 1742, that he might pity them and the whole land, and pour out his Spirit upon them, as on other places. And the Rev. Mr. William M'Culloch, their minister, who frequently met with them, having at their desire, joined with others in the parish, set up a weekly sermon upon Thursday a little before, and preaching closely to them upon the nature and necessity of regeneration; it pleased the Lord, that, upon Thursday the 18th of Feb. 1742, the Holy Spirit so wrought upon his hearers, that about fifty of them, with many attending them, came into his house, under alarming apprehensions about the state of their souls, crying, "What shall we do to be saved?" The minister, being much affected with their case, spent all that day and night with them, either separately or together, in exhortations, instructions, prayers, and singing psalms; being assisted in the work by some preachers and elders. And the awakened and wounded people daily increasing, he was obliged to preach to and converse with them every day for a great many weeks thereafter; the people filling all the rooms of his house after sermon, and continuing in prayer and singing psalms in different companies till near midnight. Many ministers came from other places to Mr. M'Culloch's assistance, with multitudes of people to hear the word, and to be witnesses of that very uncommon work; and there many of them felt the power of the word, and went home with the arrows of God sticking in their hearts; and great numbers of these convinced people attained also to a fair appearance of a hopeful outgate; having their minds filled with peace and joy in believing. This was a wonderful time at Cambuslang for many months in the year 1742, and the pleasant fruits of it continued to appear both in that and the following years. In the summer of the same year, viz. 1742, the work began to spread and appear remarkably in Kilsyth, Calder, Kirkintilloch, Campsie, Cumbernauld, Gargunnoch, Baldernock, Muthil, and many other parishes; and even in Edinburgh and Glasgow there was a considerable revival in religion. In May, 1742, there was published a narrative of the work at Cambuslang, attested by many; and soon after another narrative of the work at Kilsyth and parishes about it, continued in different parts, and published from time to time by the reverend Mr. James Robe. These narratives, being well attested, were spread and reprinted in America and different places of the world; they were translated into Dutch, and had several editions in Holland, and were well received by the ministers and divines there.

The work indeed was very surprising and extraordinary, much resembling that which was in the last century at Stewartown, Irvine, Kirk of Shots, and other places, in the years 1625, 1626, and several years after, though in a very dismal backsliding time; and that work in Ireland, about Antrim, and the Six-mile-water, about the year 1628; of both which Mr. Robert Fleming, once minister at Cambuslang, gives account, in the Fulfilling of the Scriptures; as doth Mr. Robert Blair and Mr. John Livingstone, in the manuscripts of their lives. And there being much said and written about this work in the west of Scotland, we have thought ourselves bound to inquire into the nature, fruits, and evidences of it; and from what some of us have seen of that work, and hath been attested by the ministers immediately concerned, and others who have seen it, we judge ourselves warranted to give our testimony to it, as a glorious work of the Spirit of God, which he hath been pleased to send, in his sovereign free mercy, in a time of great infidelity, formality, and backsliding, to glorify his own name, by awakening, convincing, humbling, converting, comforting, reviving, strengthening, and confirming many souls through the land; and our reasons for it are these: 1. The convictions and comforts of the people of Cambuslang, and other awakened parishes, have come to them in a scriptural way, by Christ's ordinances, and particularly the word preached, and passages of scripture carried in upon their minds, suited to their cases and circumstances. 2. The fruits and effects of that work in the people's lives and conversations, evidenced themselves to be from the Holy Spirit, according to the scripture account of these fruits: for those who formerly were blind and ignorant, have soon come to advance in the knowledge of Jesus Christ and divine things; and the tongues which were dumb in the things of God, have soon learned to speak the language of Canaan. They who formerly were given to cursing, swearing, drunkenness, Sabbath-breaking, scoffing at sacred things, and other immoralities, have presently changed their course into sober living, godly conference, reading, praying, and singing psalms. They who formerly were trusting to their own performances, attainments, and self-righteousness, have presently renounced all these for the righteousness of Christ only, imputed to them for their justification before God. They who formerly were wedded to the world, and to the love of sensual and sinful things, are made willing to part with all these for the love of Jesus Christ their Saviour, desiring earnestly to be conformed to him in his contempt of the world, self-denial, humility, and holiness, both in heart and life. They who before thought it an unmanly thing to shed tears for sin, and piercing of Christ, have been made to mourn as for an only son, and be in bitterness as for a first-born. Those who have been guilty of secret acts of injustice, have been filled with remorse for them, and made restitution to the persons injured or their children. They who hated and mocked the people of God, have their hearts warmed with love to them, and account them the excellent ones of the earth. They who before were contentious, malicious, and revengeful, presently dropped their quarrels, forgave their enemies, wish well to their souls, and the salvation of all around them. They who before minded only their own things, are highly concerned for the interests of Jesus Christ and for the declarative glory of God in the world. Swearers have dropped their oaths, and with reverence mention the name of God. And they who loved carnal company, merry jests, profane songs, and foolish talking, seek after the company of those who will join with them in prayer, praises, and talking about their soul-concerns. They who before complained of nothing but bodily ailments, worldly losses, crosses, and disappointments, now complain mainly of unbelieving hearts and indwelling corruptions. They who before ascribed their virtues and good things to themselves, now exalt Christ and free grace for every attainment, and in the whole of their salvation: and yet, while they ascribe all to free grace, they aim in Christ's strength at universal holiness, at the subduing of every sin, and the practice of every duty and good work, according to both the first and second tables of the law, and make conscience of stational and relational duties as well as others. Families, that formerly were synagogues of Satan, are now temples where God is devoutly worshipped: and many of all ages and sexes form themselves into little societies for prayer, praise, and religious discourse. And though tares are mixed among the wheat, and several hypocrites discovered, yet the body of the awakened persevere, as to what can be seen, in the ways of religion.

Notwithstanding of all these gracious changes, which are clear evidences of the operations of the Holy Spirit; yet this blessed work is mightily opposed and reproached, and that not only by atheistical and profane men, but even by many of those who have long been praying for the effusion of the Spirit, and the coming of Christ's kingdom, particularly our seceding brethren, who have, alas! preached, prayed, and printed against this good work, and even kept fasts in all their meetings, for putting a stop to it; as a delusion and work of the devil, who hath transformed himself into an angel of light, as they say; and have thereby given their followers very frightful notions of it, and stopt them from going near the places where they might have got full satisfaction: and also, they have hindered many from giving praise to God for his wonderful goodness, and from praying for the continuance and spreading of the work. May the Lord lay all this to their hearts, but not to their charge! Their main quarrel with the work seems to be, that it is begun and carried on by the instrumentality of the national church, and some whom they judged accessory to the defections therein; and because it is attended with outcries, trembling, falling down and fainting in many of those who are awakened; which, they say, are not symptoms of a work of the Spirit.

Concerning which we shall observe these few things:

1. Our brethren had certainly acted much more the part of wise and unbiased judges, if, in obedience to Christ's command to "try the spirits," and "prove all things," they had used all proper means of inquiry, such as going themselves to the places, conversing with the ministers, and with the subjects wrought upon, before they had pronounced a judicial sentence in such a weighty case, and intimated it from their pulpits; and not have proceeded to a decision so hastily upon hearsays, or the malicious reports of profane spirits, and those who were enemies of the work. They also had done wisely, to have waited some time to see the issue of the work before they had passed such a terrible sentence upon it: for they might have remembered that it is not an easy thing for clergymen, after doing a bad thing, to own their mistake.

2. It cannot be denied but there have been many eminent godly ministers employed in promoting this work; and, though there had been some not so remarkable that way, we must not find fault with a holy sovereign God for making use of what instruments he pleases. Our brethren cannot but know that it is a most provoking sin to limit the holy One of Israel, who frequently thinks fit to employ mean and despised instruments to do his work, that so he may stain the pride of all our glory, and show that he is not beholden to any.

3. We are grieved in our very hearts, that our brethren should have adventured upon such a daring step, as by a judicial sentence to ascribe to the devil such a gracious god-like work, as that before described; when they cannot bring an instance from scripture, or any other history, of the devil's being permitted to work in the like manner before. Surely it may make us tremble to think what kind of a sin it must be to make the devil the reprover of sin, and minister of righteousness, and so to assign the office and work of the Holy Ghost to that wicked one! Doth it not look like a fearful limiting of God, for a few men to act as if they would confine the Holy Spirit's workings to themselves, and give up the ministry of all their brethren throughout the Island to the devil? As Jesus Christ himself, so his ministers, Moses, John Baptist, the apostles Peter and Paul, were of quite different tempers and dispositions; they rejoiced to see the Spirit poured down upon others, and to see Christ preached, sinners brought in to him, and his kingdom enlarged, whoever were the instruments of it.

4. As for the effects of this work upon the bodies of some of the awakened, such as outerying, trembling, falling down, or fainting; these are not at all new in this land: for many instances of such like symptoms in persons under piercing convictions of sin, or under ravishing views of Christ, can be given, even since our happy revolution, as well as in former times; as is evident from Messrs. Robe, Currie, and Webster's writings on this subject. And yet we hear not of any heretofore ascribing the work in those people to the devil, nor condemning it as contrary to scripture, upon account of these symptoms: No, for the scripture gives frequent instances of such impressions made on the body, by the great inward exercise and concern of the mind. The sharp convictions of the three thousand, Acts ii. brought them under great agonies, being pricked as with a sword in their hearts, and forced to cry out, and say to the apostles, "Men and brethren, and what shall we do?" The auditory being great, they must have cried in such a manner that the apostles heard them; for Peter was forced to cry aloud that they might hear him, Acts ii. 14. So Paul when he was thoroughly convinced of his sin of persecuting Christ, and the wrath due to him for it, he was seized with "trembling and astonishment, and fell to the ground," Acts ix. 4, 6. Also the jailer, when awakened to see his sinful and lost state under wrath, "trembled and fell down," saying, "What must I do to be saved?" Acts vi. 29, 30. And it appears to have been usual in the apostles' days for sinners to "fall down before God," when they were first convinced, and got the secret wickedness of their heart laid open to them by the Word, 1 Cor. xiv. 24, 25. Even that great man, Felix, was made to tremble under his conviction of sin and apprehension of wrath, while Paul preached to him, Acts xxiv. 25. And that mighty king, Belshazzar, was strangely affected when he saw the hand writing on the wall, which he took to be a presage of wrath against him, Dan. v. 6, "His countenance was changed, his joints loosed, and his knees smote one against another." A view of the wrath of a sin-revenging God, is enough to throw the stoutest sinner into the most terrible disorder, and to overwhelm all his senses and faculties. We see Baruch, when in danger of the wrath of man, was so overwhelmed with grief, that he fainted under it, and cries out, Jer. xiv. 3, "Woe is me now, for the Lord hath added grief to my sorrow: I fainted in my sighing, and had no rest." And how much more would he have been distressed with the immediate views and approaches of the wrath of God! for, "Who knoweth the power of his anger?" Job, when under the apprehension of God being his enemy, and his terrors pursuing him, was so little master of himself, that he "stood up, and cried in the congregation," Job xxx. 15, 28. King David says, he "roared by reason of the disquietness of his heart," Psal. xxxviii. 8. Nay, he had such impressions of the wrath of God upon his soul, that they made all his flesh to tremble, Psal. cxxix. 120, "My flesh trembleth for fear of thee, and I am afraid of thy judgments." Heman saith, "While I suffer thy terrors, I am distracted," Psal. lxxxviii. 15. We see also how the prophet Habakkuk was seized with the greatest bodily distress, with "quivering lips, and trembling," over all his body, at the view of approaching wrath, Hab. iii. 16. Again, it ought to be remembered, that God hath told us, that in the New Testament days he would pour out his Spirit upon people in such a manner, that they should "look upon him they pierced by their sins, and mourn, and be in bitterness," as parents "for an only son or first-born." Now, it is well known that some parents will not only cry out bitterly, but also faint, upon such occasions; nay, some will be brought to such agonies and faintings, by the mere apprehension and prospect of man's wrath and of temporal difficulties: and have they not much greater cause for them, who get a clear and manifest discovery of the heinous guilt of their sins, and of the wrath of an angry God hanging over them? Who can paint forth the distress of these poor creatures, whose spirits are wounded by the amazing apprehensions of God's wrath for sin, and the fearful expectations of judgments and fiery indignation, without having any view of relief? Such a wise man as Solomon would not have been surprised to see such persons tremble, cry out, or faint; for, saith he, "A wounded spirit who can bear?" Prov. xviii. 14.

We read also in scripture of persons fainting upon other occasions. Jacob fainted for joy, when he heard that his son was alive and highly exalted; so Daniel, after singular manifestations from God, fainted and was sick certain days, Dan. viii. 27; x. 8, 9. And the apostle John, when he saw the Lord in his glory, fell at his feet as a dead man. So it is no wonder that a poor soul, that was like to sink in despair under a sense of sin and wrath, when coming out of this plunge to a surprising view of Christ's mercy, loveliness, and fulness, should in like manner be overwhelmed and faint for love and joy. Wherefore it is our duty to put favourable constructions upon the various cases of awakened and exercised souls, when thereby they are thrown into ecstasies, faintings, or bodily distresses. The Holy Spirit is a free sovereign agent; and, in times of large effusions, he may, for his own wise ends, take an uncommen latitude in his way of dealing with sinners, for bringing them into Christ. And as their discoveries of sin and wrath, and the commotion in their affections, prove very different; so the impressions upon their bodies must be either less or more, and exceeding various, according to the measure and degree of inward exercise and concern of their minds; for as their sorrow for piercing Christ by their sins is compared to that of parents for an only son, which admits of many different degrees, and produceth very different effects in different persons; so it must be unreasonable in any to require instances in scripture for every minute circumstance of the innumerable various cases of persons brought into Christ; for then the Spirit of God must have enlarged the scriptures into very many different volumes, which had not been convenient for us. If we read the accounts given us of the conversions of Augustine, Luther, Junius, Beza, Latimer, Bolton, professor Halyburton, and many other eminent saints, we will find particular circumstances in them for which no scripture precedent can be shown; but no wise man will say upon that account, that the work in them was delusive or diabolical.

But let some object what they will against the conversions in the west, because of the outward impressions attending them in severals, for in many the changes are wrought without any noise at all: it is our judgment, if these bitter throws and agonies of some have a merciful issue in landing them in Jesus Christ and true holiness, as it is visible they do in the most part; then there is great matter of praise, whatever way the Lord take for awakening and humbling them before-hand. But seeing worthy Mr. Edwards of Northampton hath written two treatises concerning this extraordinary work of the Spirit of God, and hath taken notice of all the prejudices and objections of adversaries, we judge it unnecessary to add any more to what he hath written so fully and to such excellent purpose. May the Lord, by new showers from above, continue, revive, increase, and spread this blessed work through the land and all corners of the earth! Amen and Amen.

That we may draw to a conclusion, we shall briefly sum up the principal sins, errors, evils, and defections in the church and land, which we think ourselves bound to lament and mourn over, declare, warn, and bear testimony against, in order to promote reformation and healing in the land: for although God, in his boundless sovereignty and rich grace, be pleased in a backsliding time to grant some remarkable reviving to his work in particular corners, to show his willingness to return to his ancient dwelling-place; yet we despair of any general reviving or national reformation, until we are made sensible of public sins, errors, and defections, as well as these of a more private nature. Wherefore we desire to be humbled for, declare and testify against, all doctrines and practices which are opposite to the Bible, and to our Confession of Faith, Larger and Shorter Catechisms, Directories for Worship and Church Government, which we judge drawn out of, and founded upon, the scriptures of truth.

And particularly, against all Deistical and Socinian errors, and doctrines, which tend to decry the necessity of supernatural revelation, and cry up the sufficiency of reason or the light of nature to guide men to eternal happiness.

And against all Arian errors, and those doctrines which any ways disparage the Christian revelation, or derogate from the scheme of salvation through the mediation and righteousness of Jesus Christ our only Saviour; or from the doctrine of the glorious Trinity, and the oneness of the Godhead; or from Christ's true supreme deity, his self-existence, necessary existence, independence, and equality with the Father; or from the true Deity of the Holy Ghost, and his equality with the Father and the Son; or from the truth of Christ's manhood, and of his priestly office, and the necessity of his death as a real and proper sacrifice to satisfy divine justice for our sins.

All Popish errors, idolatry, and superstition, maintained either by professed Papists, or by Protestants who are making advances towards Popery, by pleading for a middle state for souls departed; prayers for the dead; the eucharist's being a proper sacrifice for sin; the necessity of confessing sin to the priest, and of the priest's absolution in order to the forgiveness of sin; of mixing the sacramental wine with water; of bowing to the altar, to the east, and at the name of Jesus; of kneeling at the sacrament, observing saints' days and uninstituted festivals, and putting them on a level with the Lord's day; the cross in baptism, the organ in praise, the reading of prayers, and other human inventions in God's worship and service.

All Pelagian and Arminian doctrines, which derogate from God's efficacious free grace in saving sinners, or put it in the power of a man's own free will or natural abilities to repent, believe, or convert himself; and make a necessary connection between a man's moral seriousness and his obtaining of saving grace. Also all these doctrines which tend to exalt self, or any ways place it in God's room; and those which make self-love, and the desire of our own happiness, the proper spring and principle of all virtuous and religious actions.

The magistrate's assuming the power of the keys, and all Erastian encroachments upon the intrinsic power of the church, or upon Christ's headship and supremacy over her. The granting an almost boundless toleration to all sects, errors, heresies, and innovations. The imposing the sacramental test upon officers civil and military when out of Scotland, as a necessary qualification for their offices; whereby the holy sacrament is much debased and profaned. The multiplying of oaths without necessity; introducing the new form of swearing by kissing the Gospels, the Yule-vacance, the repealing of the laws against witchcraft, &c.

The imposing the yoke of patronage upon the church, and spoiling Christian congregations of their right to choose their own pastors, and obtruding pastors upon them. As also the practice of the ministers or preachers, who contribute to encourage, strengthen, or bind the yoke of patronage upon the church, by allowing their friends to apply to patrons and procure presentations for them; or by accepting these presentations, and cleaving to them when obtained. And the practice of those ministers or judicatories, who encourage or support these acceptors in this pernicious course, or who obtrude them or any other persons upon parishes against their consent.

The denying the lawfulness or obligation of our national covenant engagements, the warrantableness of national churches, Confession of Faith, subordination of church judicatories one to another; the maintaining the independency of single congregations upon any superior church-judicatory; the lodging the power of the keys, not in the hands of church-officers, but in the communion of the faithful.

The prosecuting or censuring of ministers for preaching or protesting against any of the evils or defections of the time, such as the despising of Christ's flock, making intrusions upon them, encroaching upon the rights and liberties of the church, or Christ's headship over her, &c.

The neglect and unfrequent administration of the Lord's supper, and the abuse and profanation of it, by admitting ignorant or ungodly persons to it. Also the neglect of appointing national fasts, and days for humiliation and extraordinary prayer, in a time of national defections, and of abounding sins and provocations, when many spiritual judgments are inflicted, and other great judgments are impending over us. And when such fasts come to be appointed, alas! what an aversion is there to a particular condescendence of the sins and defections which are the true cause of the Lord's controversy with the land!

Likewise we judge ourselves bound to bewail, lament, and witness against, all these God-dishonouring sins and evils which universally abound and prevail among all ranks and sorts of men; such as ignorance and forgetfulness of God their Creator and Preserver; atheism, infidelity, and enmity to God; ingratitude to God for mercies; putting the creatures, the world, and self, in the room of God; consulting with necromancers, wizards, and charmers; ascribing our mercies to fortune or second causes, rather than to God. Self-love, self-seeking, unbelief, distrust of God, hatred of him and of his image in others. Pride, presumption, carnal security; loving pleasures more than God. Restraining of prayer before God in secret; neglect of family-worship; tempting God by neglecting means, using unlawful means, and trusting in lawful means. Superstition and false worship; giddiness and unsettledness in religion, and drinking in error. Mean and low thoughts of Christ, and of the infinite love of God in providing Christ to be a Surety and sacrifice for us. Contempt of the glorious gospel, and the glad tidings it brings; and men's unfruitfulness under it. Not receiving and loving of Jesus Christ; not relying on Christ as all our hope; not making use of Christ in all his offices, not rejoicing in Christ and him crucified. Men's resting upon their duties and frames for acceptance with God: their joining something of their own with Christ's righteousness for their justification before God, and not accounting all things loss and dung for Christ, that they may be found in him, not having their own righteousness, which is nothing but filthy rags. Grieving of the Holy Spirit, sinning him away from ordinances; not lamenting the withdrawing of the Spirit, nor wrestling for his return. Opposing and reproaching the work of the Spirit in awakening and convincing sinners; calling it enthusiasm, delusion, or ascribing it to Satan. Blind and intemperate zeal; discontent and impatience under the dispensations of divine providence. Backslidings from God, and the decay of the life and power of godliness. Setting our affections upon earthly enjoyments and sensual satisfactions; and neglecting these things wherein our chief happiness consists, namely, the enjoying of God, and communion with him. Our unthankful forgetting of the many signal deliverances which God hath wrought for this church and land; and our unthankfulness for and abuse of the valuable mercies we still enjoy, such as health, peace, plenty; freedom from pestilence, sword, and famine; and the continuance of the gospel and pure ordinances with us. Our minding our own things more than the things of Jesus Christ. Our little praying for the coming of Christ's kingdom, and for the peace and prosperity of Jerusalem.

Our neglecting the ordinances of God's appointment, careless attending upon them, and not regarding them as places for meeting with God, and as means of communion with him. Our being wise above what is written, and advancing men's devices before divine appointments. Our resting upon our outward attending of ordinances, and a name to live, without the new birth, and a work of grace in our souls. Our contenting ourselves with man's teaching, without the teachings and influences of the Spirit with the Word. Our being little affected or afflicted with the blasting of ordinances, and the suspending of the Spirit's influences. Our unworthy communicating, and formal approaches to God at his holy table; neglecting due preparation, by self-examination, secret humiliation, renewing covenant with God, and wrestling with him for his presence. Our losing soon the impressions of Christ's sufferings, his precious blood, and matchless love, set forth in that ordinance; and not living answerably thereto. Our putting our hearing, praying, or communicating, charitable acts, just dealing, or moral honesty, in the room of glorious Christ, who alone is "the Lord our righteousness."

We also lament and witness against the abounding profanation of God's holy name, by the irreverent use of it in common discourse, by formal and hypocritical addresses to him, by customary and rash swearing, cursing, blaspheming, perjury, swearing falsely in matters of trade or taxes, bribing, and tempting others to do so. By perfidious dealing with God, in breaking both national and personal covenants, sacramental vows, and sick-bed resolutions. Decay of zeal for maintaining of truth, purity, and piety, in opposition to abounding error, superstition, and profanity. The profaning and abusing of God's titles, attributes, ordinances, scriptures, servants, and providences; by many scoffing at sacred things, jesting upon the scriptures, mocking the professors of religion, misconstruing God's providences, wrestling and misapplying his word to favour their corrupt sentiments and practices; vain jangling, and disputing about smaller points, and taking up their thoughts and time therewith, to the neglecting and eating out the life of religion. Slighting, aspersing, and reviling many of God's faithful servants, thereby marring the success of their ministry, and scattering their flocks, to the prejudice and ruin of many precious souls. Many taking up a profession of greater strictness in religion than others, while strangers to humiliation for sin, regeneration, heart-holiness, tenderness of walk, humbleness of mind, meekness, and the true spirit of Christianity. Alas! many are so puffed up with pride, vanity, self-conceit, and contempt of others, that they cast out of their charity and communion every one that agrees not to their sentiments and practices in all respects, though some of these have more evident marks of the image of God upon them than they themselves! And many are hereby tempted to infidelity, even to mock, hate, and cast off all religion, because of the divisions among the professors of it. Ah! many professed Christians show a great propension to exalt natural reason, and deery supernatural revelation; to magnify the religion of nature, and disparage the religion of Jesus! to ascribe such to man's free-will and natural powers, and overlook the free grace of God, and preventing the work of his Spirit. Many speak more of their own moral performances than of Christ's imputed righteousness; and seem to regard Christ more as a pattern than as a propitiation; exalt their natural powers and self-righteousness, through ignorance of the righteousness of God; cry up the preaching of morality, while they themselves remain immoral, and ignorant of their own corrupt natural estate, and of the nature and necessity of regeneration. Alas! there is ground to fear that many outwardly assent to our Confession of Faith, who scarcely read it, consider it, or believe it; and it is to be feared that severals, even preachers, may come to subscribe it, as those of the church of England do their Thirty-nine Articles, rather as vinculum pacis, than as vinculum veritatis.

We also bewail and testify against the profanation of the Lord's day which sadly abounds, as being a nursery of, and an inlet to, all manner of sin and corruption: by many speaking their own words on this day, and discoursing of worldly affairs and business: by many doing their own work, such as unnecessary pieces of servile labour, or travelling about worldly business: by many finding their own pleasures by idle walking, needless visits, and other worldly diversions and recreations: while in the mean time few make conscience of setting apart and spending this day as a day of sacred rest, according to its institution, for entertaining serious thoughts of the works of God and redeeming love, for attending religious worship without distraction, for promoting spirituality and heavenly-mindedness, for holding communion with God through Jesus Christ, and for loosing their hearts from the world, and preparing for death and heaven. Alas! many, instead of such exercises, dedicate this holy day to profanity; and, in place of serving God the Author of it, they serve the devil and their lusts upon it, by gaming, drinking, swearing, uncleanness, filthy speeches, jesting upon sacred things, and reproaching the devout worshippers of God! And so they go faster to hell upon the Lord's day, than upon any other day of the week.

We likewise bewail and testify against the stational and relational sins which abound in the land, among parents and children, masters and servants, husbands and wives, magistrates and subjects, ministers and people; superiors, inferiors, and equals. Alas! many superiors are guilty of contempt of their inferiors, of proud and imperious carriage towards them, of oppressing them, or ruling them with rigour, of discouraging them from what is good, and encouraging them to what is evil. Many inferiors are guilty of despising their superiors, envying their situation, disobedience to their just commands and counsels, and not imitating their good example; and particularly many children are thus dreadfully guilty with respect to their godly parents. And, among equals, there is little brotherly love, mutual esteem, and good offices to be seen; but, instead thereof, very much appears of hatred, anger, malice, envy, evil-speaking, reproaching, and backbiting, and also of tempting and encouraging one another to sin. Ah! many parents forget their engagements at baptism, and neglect to instruct and pray for their children, to admonish and reprove them when needful, and either do not correct them at all, or do it unduly, provoking them to wrath. Oh! many heads of families neglect family-religion, prayer, praises, and catechising of children and servants, and requiring an account of the sermons they hear; or, at best, they perform family-prayer and other duties in a cold and formal manner. O how many have no more care of the souls of their families than if they had none! They seek only their own things, pursuing the business of a present animal life, and not the things of Jesus Christ, or what concerns their spiritual or eternal life! And many who have formerly come a good length, and kept good order in their families, have sadly declined, lost their wonted liveliness and spirituality in God's service, and let their duties dwindle away into a dead formality, contenting themselves with external performances, ordinances, and communions, without any communion with God in them.

We must also regret the untenderness and looseness of the walk and conduct of some in the ministry, whereby not a few are tempted to abhor the offerings of the Lord; and a Gallio-like indifference in others about the public interest of Christ, if it go well with their own private affairs. And few, alas! are lamenting after a departing God, and searching into, or mourning for, the causes as they ought, or wrestling for a returning God, and a returning glory. Many preachers are running unsent, and using means to thrust themselves into the vineyard, not waiting for God's call, nor regarding the prayers or inclinations of his people; and who in their sermons generally confine themselves to subjects of natural religion and moral virtue, and neglect the doctrines of Christ and the Spirit, the peculiar glories of Christianity; and do not preach the absolute freeness of grace through Christ, as the spring of a sinner's justification and salvation. Likewise not a few ministers and Christians want love and a due forbearance to others who differ from them in some lesser matters; entertain harsh thoughts, and break out into uncharitable censures and severe reflections one against another, to the hindrance of that sweet fellowship and social prayer which they should have together, and to the taking them off, in a great measure, from the vitals and essentials of religion, and from pure ordinances, which God continues still to own.

We lament the malicious and revengeful thoughts of many, and the frequent sallies of their ungoverned passions, which sometimes break out into provoking language and acts of violence, and even into bloodshed and murders; and often the law is not duly executed against murderers.

We testify against the prevailing sins of tippling, drunkenness, gluttony, chambering, wantonness, fornication, adultery, unnatural lusts, and all sorts of uncleanness, wanton gestures, obscene talk, immodest apparel, lascivious songs and dancings, lottery games, balls, assemblies, and stage-plays, which, however fashionable they may be, we look upon as unbecoming the gravity, seriousness, faith, and hope of true Christians, who profess to place all their happiness in the enjoyment of God, and to be careful to abstain from all appearance of evil, and wait for the coming of their Lord and Saviour from heaven.

Likewise, we bear witness against the prevailing evils of stealing, robbing, extortion, defrauding, prodigality, simony, bribery, running of goods, men's using unlawful occupations, living above their incomes, undertaking vexatious law suits, pleading for causes manifestly unjust: lying, slandering, spreading evil reports, aggravating smaller faults, rash censuring, supporting false witnesses, backbiting, scolding, scoffing, misconstruing the actions, words, or intentions of others: men's discontent with their lot and condition in the world; envying or grieving at the prosperity or credit of their neighbours; being glad at their adversity, miscarriage, or disgrace; coveting or entertaining inordinate motions and affections to those things which belong to their neighbours.

Moreover, we bewail and testify against all the foresaid sins, evils, and defections of the land, as being highly aggravated in the sight of God, being committed against clear light, the Spirit's strivings, manifold warnings, alluring mercies, solemn covenants, and wonderful deliverances; against great pains taken by God upon the land to reclaim and reform them, such as reproofs, challenges, exhortations, expostulations, invitations, promises, threatenings, and lesser judgments. And these our sins and defections have been long continued in, until very many are become secure, senseless, and hardened in them, nay, even bold and impudent, so far as to avow and justify them, to despise admonitions, and mock at reproofs. Likewise they are turned very universal: all ranks and degrees of persons are involved in the guilt of them, rich and poor, great and small, nobility, gentry, magistrates, ministers, commons, &c. Alas! our nobility and persons of distinction, who once appeared with zeal for God's truths, and for advancing reformation, are sadly degenerated, and generally corrupted, either with erroneous principles, or vicious practices. Our commons, many of them are destroyed with ignorance, profanity, or earthly-mindedness. Our professors of religion, alas! carnality and formality prevail among them, and lively piety is likely to dwindle away. O how desperate doth our case appear when under such terrible aggravations of guilt! How ripe do we seem to be for desolating strokes, and sweeping judgments! What cause have we to look out for them every day, and to fear and tremble before a holy, just, and provoked God! according to these awful texts of Scripture, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 15, 16; Isa. xxii. 12, &c.; Jer. vi. 15; viii. 12; xi. 10, 11; xxii. 7—9; Amos viii. 2, 3, &c.; Micah iii. 11, 12; Hos. xiii. 5—7; which is very applicable to our case.

But is there no hope in Israel concerning this thing? "Is there not balm in Gilead?" "Is there not a Physician there?" Is there not virtue in Christ's blood for the most desperate cases that churches can be in? O if ministers and people were applying to him by faith, there would be hope. Should we not then plead with our mother to consider her defections from God, and to be deeply humbled and mourn for them, and to turn from them to the Lord by true repentance and reformation, and to pray and plead his promises of mercy through Jesus Christ, such as that in Jer. iii. 22, "Return, ye backsliding children, and I will heal your backslidings!" We have very lately had a surprising evidence of the Lord's willingness to return and heal us; what a wonderful step has he made towards it, by pouring out his Spirit upon several congregations of the land! O what encouragement doth this give the whole land to apply to him for mercy, and to set about reformation! particularly to our general assemblies and all inferior judicatories, to go out and meet a merciful returning God, who has no delight in our ruin, and that in the way of faith, humiliation, and prayer; essay-ing sincerely to do all in their power to remove the grounds of the Lord's controversy, redress grievances, amend what is wrong, and take every stumbling-block out of the way of serious well-meaning people, which is improved as an occasion of our lamentable divisions. For these ends, let us humbly plead with our mother.

I. Inasmuch as the church is, and ought to be, the pillar and ground of the truth, and her judicatories are bound to assert, maintain, and defend every one of God's truths when attacked by adversaries, to transmit them in their purity to posterity, and to give their testimony and approbation to them, for upholding them against those teachers who would overturn them; and seeing all the members of the judicatories in this church have subscribed our Confession of Faith, and profess to adhere to the truths therein, we humbly plead that they may show more concern for the support of these truths than has been done of late years. It is to be regretted, that not only the Episcopal clergy, but several ministers of this church, have taught and vented errors, and recommended erroneous books; and some of them have been arraigned before the general assembly, as professor Simson, professor Campbell, and Dr. Wishart; and though we are far from thinking that this church hath adopted or homologated any of their errors, yet many well-wishers of the church are of opinion they were not sufficiently animadverted upon, but too easily dismissed, which may give encouragement to others to spread error. And therefore we beg leave to plead, that the general assembly would in the most proper manner testify their abhorrence of these errors whereof the aforesaid persons were accused, and these Popish errors which the Episcopal clergy are introducing, and other errors which are propagated through the island; and give warning to all the ministers and members of this church to guard against them, and study to prevent the infection of them: and particularly these errors which strike against the doctrine of the glorious Trinity, and the oneness of the Godhead; or against the supreme deity of our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; or against the doctrines of free grace, in our justification and salvation; and of the glory of God being the chief spring and motive of virtue and religion. And also, that the assembly would declare, that it is not sufficient to assuage any man processed for error, that he profess his adherence to our Confession of Faith, or explain his words into a sense consistent with it; but that he expressly renounce those errors which are charged upon him from his words, according to the plain and obvious sense of them.

II. We would also plead, that though the precious doctrines of the supremacy and headship of our Lord Jesus Christ over his church, and the church's intrinsic power derived from him, are well asserted in our Confession of Faith, Larger Catechism, Form of Church-government, approved by assembly 1645, Form of Process, 1707, and other public deeds of this church, agreeably to the holy scriptures; yet, in regard some things have been done both of old and of late which appear not so agreeable to these excellent principles, that the assembly would declare their detestation of every thing, whether in sentiment or practice, that is inconsistent with Christ's Headship, and the church's intrinsic power, asserted in our Confession of Faith, particularly chap. xxx. sect. 1, 2, in these words: "The Lord Jesus Christ, as King and Head of his church, hath therein appointed a government in the hand of church officers, distinct from the civil magistrate. To these officers the keys of the kingdom of heaven are committed," &c.

III. We must likewise plead with our mother, to cleave closely to our reformation principles, and carry always towards the grievance of patronage as a sinful usurpation upon the church of God, as the church hath frequently declared both of old and of late. And although we know there have been laudable endeavours used by this church to be freed from this usurpation, such as the commission's address in the year 1712, approved by the next assembly; the memorial of assembly 1715; the commission's sending ministers to London, in 1717, to seek relief from it; and also the commission 1734, and again the assembly 1735, sending commissioners with addresses for repealing the patronage act; and when all these endeavours proved unsuccessful, the assembly 1736 did, by their solemn and deliberate resolution, printed to the world, give it as their judgment that it was still most just and fit, upon the first favourable occasion, to apply for redress of this grievance, and record their weighty grounds and reasons for it: and also the said assembly 1736, act 14, assert our principles against intrusions, and homologate our standards and former good acts of assembly relative thereto. Yet we cannot but lament, that, notwithstanding all these deeds, there are many ministers and preachers who still encourage and strengthen the usurpation of patronage, and choose settlements by presentations rather than by gospel calls, for which the law still leaves an open door. And the judicatories connive at this their unaccountable practice, and even obtrude several of them upon reluctant congregations, capable and willing to make a right choice for themselves; which has occasioned a dismal scattering of the flock of Christ, and miserable animosities, disorders, and distractions in many places of the land, to the great hindrance of the gospel. For remedying whereof, it is humbly proposed, 1. That the general assembly would declare, that presbyteries having free access to moderate in calls to vacant parishes, and congregations having freedom to choose their ministers, is a part of the discipline and government of this church, which, by the Formula 1711, all ministers and preachers are bound to support and maintain, and to do nothing directly or indirectly to the prejudice thereof, as it is there worded. 2. That the assembly would discharge all ministers and preachers to take measures to obtrude themselves or others upon congregations against their will, by presentations or any other way; and to declare if any, by his accepting of or adhering to a presentation, shall stand in the way of a presbytery's free moderation, or a parish's free election, he shall be looked upon as a deserter of the principles of this church, and treated as guilty of contravening his solemn engagements by the said Formula and otherwise. 3. That the assembly would enforce the 14th act of assembly 1736, against intrusions, and take care in all settlements, and in all acts which may be framed concerning them, to maintain our principles, and the just rights of Christian congregations; and expressly discharge all inferior judicatories to plant any parish contrary to the mind of the eldership and Christian people, with certification; seeing there is no ground to expect that the great ends of a gospel-ministry can be obtained in such forced settlements. 4. That the assembly would enjoin all judicatories and ministers to have a due regard to all the members of Christ's flock, and to all serious praying Christians, and not to despise those of them who are poor and mean in the world, but to esteem and put honour upon them, and seek an interest in their prayers, and have a regard to their inclinations in planting parishes: and in all decisions about settlements and cases wherein the glory of God and good of souls are highly concerned, to guard against the fear of man, which brings a snare. And to beware of all such lax managements, or untender steps, as may drive good men from judicatories or the communion of the church. 5. That the assembly take care that all concerned in calling of ministers have freedom to act, without any compulsion or undue influence. 6. That the assembly order, that congregations who have been aggrieved by the settlement of ministers without their consent, shall be treated with compassion and lenity; and to fall upon methods to remove such ministers from them, when parishes cannot be brought to submit to them. 7. That the assembly appoint, that all appeals from the sentences of synods be only to the general assembly; and, if there be any of them which the assembly cannot overtake, that they be referred to the commission, to be judged by them at meeting immediately after the assembly, when their diets are numerous; it not being agreeable to Presbyterian principles and party, that a great number of ministers should be subjected to the authority and judgment of a lesser.

8. That presbyteries be strictly enjoined to be most careful and conscientious in licensing men to preach the gospel, and in observing the many good acts of assembly thereanent; and that both presbyteries and synods shall inquire, not only into their literature, but also into their sense and savour of true godliness, and into their acquaintance with the true gospel-scheme of justification, and the way of making use of Christ, and living by faith upon him, and with the work of the Spirit upon their souls, and experimental religion; and also inquire into their sentiments concerning patronage and other grievances of the church: and that presbyteries recommend none to synods or other presbyteries to be entered upon trials, but such as they can safely attest in terms of these acts and rules. 9. That the assembly declare, that as it is the duty of ministers, so they are still at full freedom, to testify in a becoming manner, and upon proper grounds, against the prevailing corruptions of the times, and even against what is wrong in the acts and proceedings of church judicatories. 10. That presbyteries be enjoined to be strictly conscientious in attesting ruling elders who are to sit in assemblies or commissions, and particularly that they be qualified in terms of the 9th act of assembly 1722, as their attestation is appointed to bear; and that every presbytery shall cause read the said act every time before they either choose or attest any elder. 11. That the assembly make more narrow inquiry into the right and warrant which colleges and royal burghs have to choose ministers or elders to sit in the general assembly.

IV. We humbly plead that national fasts and thanksgivings may be more frequently appointed, when God in his providence calls unto them; and that no occasion be given to any to say that the church has resigned her power into the hands of the magistrate. And seeing at this time there is a manifest growth of infidelity, error, and impiety; of defections, gross sins, and abominations; of contempt of God, perjuries, and unnecessary multiplying of oaths; of woful divisions, breaches, and want of brotherly love and Christian charity; besides grieving of the Holy Spirit, and manifold spiritual plagues every where abounding; and also the terrible judgments of the sword and plague raging in other nations, which may very soon reach us; all which are visible tokens of the Lord's anger and indignation gone out against us, and call us loudly to mourning and humiliation before the Lord: wherefore we think it our duty to plead with humility, that the general assembly would lay these things to heart, and appoint a solemn national fast to be religiously observed because of them: and that they would be more particular than heretofore, in enumerating the grounds and causes of the said fast, namely, our own and our forefathers' sins and defections, by covenant breaking, and treacherous dealing with God, and the fearful indignities done to our solemn covenants in the late times, taken notice of by the assembly 1701; the blasphemous advancing the magistrate's supremacy over the house of God; the imposing and taking of sinful oaths, especially the self-contradictory Test; the shedding the blood of God's servants and people for not complying with the evil courses of these times; the Erastian encroachments made upon the Headship of Christ, and the rights and privileges of his church; the encouragement which is given to all manner of errors; our backslidings from reformation principles, the intrusions made upon congregations, and the scattering of the Lord's flock; the abounding of all manner of profanity and immorality, atheism and blasphemy, especially in our armies and fleets, which, alas! are so great and avowed in them, that, instead of serving as a hedge and defence to us, their sins may provoke the Lord to bring desolating strokes both on them and us. These, and many other sins, evils, and defections, before mentioned and witnessed against in this Testimony, to which we refer, may very fitly be brought in among the causes of a national fast, seeing they greatly abound in the land; and especially that sin which may be reckoned the source of all the rest, namely, the "undervaluing of redeeming love, and slighting of the Lord Jesus Christ" offered to us in the gospel, and our woful misimprovement of the means of grace, and walking unanswerably to them.

V. As we think ourselves bound thus to plead with our mother, to do away her sins and provocations, and put a stop to all her defections; so we think it our duty to plead with her to deliberate upon, and take the most proper and effectual methods for reviving the power of godliness, and the practice of gospel-holiness; and particularly that our general assemblies, when they meet, would set apart diets for these ends, and would also recommend it warmly to synods, presbyteries, kirk-sessions, and private Christians, to consult together for promoting religion and godliness in the bounds where they live, and to have their set times of meeting for spiritual conference, fasting, prayer, and wrestling, for the down-pouring of the Spirit upon the whole church and land, for awakening, convincing, converting, and reforming a secure and sinful people; and at these meetings to quicken, excite, and exhort one another to all religious duties and Christian offices, looking earnestly to the Lord for his Spirit's influence and special blessings upon all these means and endeavours, and continuing still in the use of means, waiting for a more plentiful effusion of the Spirit, until at length the whole land arrive at the happy frame and disposition of our forefathers, when they with one consent renewed covenant with God, and dedicated themselves and their posterity unto the Lord. And that they recommend it especially to the ministers, to be exemplary and actively instrumental in such religious projects and designs among their people, and even to travail in birth till Christ be formed in their souls; and carefully to observe the directions of the 7th act of assembly 1736, concerning the preaching of Christ and regeneration to them, and pressing morality in a gospel-strain; and in their ministrations to make a difference between the precious and the vile, between humble, praying, circumspect Christians, and formal professors; to honour them that fear the Lord, though they be poor; to speak well of them, support their characters against enemies and scoffers; and exercise greater familiarity with them than others.

O how pleasant and desirable a sight would it be, to see ministers, elders, and Christians, joining in such noble designs and endeavours! What a promising token for good would it be, if all the ministers and members of this church were setting about wrestling and prayer for the Lord's returning unto us by his Spirit, and endeavouring a personal and general reformation of all that is wrong among us, and in this way studying to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace, with all lowliness, meekness, and long-suffering, forbearing one another in love! These things, if gone into, we hope would tend to the glory of God, the honour and welfare of this church, the credit of the holy ministry, the edification and comfort of the Lord's people, and the healing of our present divisions and breaches.

IT is fit the reader should know, that the preceding Testimony was signed and sent to the press before the assembly 1744; otherwise some occurrences, which have made some noise since that time, had been noticed in it, some of which I shall mention in a Postscript after the Adherence and subscriptions subjoined to this Testimony.

Likewise it is proper to acquaint the reader, lest he be surprised with the paucity of the subscribers, that there were not very many who had opportunity to see and peruse the Testimony before it was published; and a great part of those who did see it, though they agreed to the scope and substance of it, in regard it contained their sentiments, yet they thought not proper to subscribe it upon some prudential considerations, which, with all submission, I cannot say have the same weight with me as with them. Yet at the same time I am bound, in justice, to own, that sundry of these are persons whom I highly value, and reckon to be real friends of truth and reformation as well as others. Wherefore, when I found things turn out in this manner, and not as I expected, I desisted from asking more subscriptions to this Testimony, which, as told in the Preface and in the Adherence, was not designed to be the badge of a party, or a term of communion. But if any now, upon seeing and considering this Testimony when published, with the reasons for it, shall incline to join with it, and send their subscriptions to the printer, with such form of adherence, exceptions, or amendments, as they think proper, they shall be taken in, and justice done them in a second Edition, if it be called for.

As for those who have willingly offered their subscriptions to this essay, I could not warrantably suppress them, though few, without their own consent. God may countenance the honest endeavour of a small number when he thinks fit. Wherefore I shall annex them here, with the form of Adherence which they agreed unto.

ADHERENCE.

WE, whose names are underwritten, having seen and considered the above Paper, called, A Fair and Impartial Testimony, &c., do hereby declare, That we think the scope and intention of it good, and that it doth express the sentiments of many ministers, elders, and Christian people of the church of Scotland, concerning the principles, wrestlings, and attainments of the said church, and concerning the defections, corruptions, and evils therein mentioned. And in regard the said Testimony seems to be drawn up with impartiality, plainness, and uprightness of design, not to be the badge of a party, or a term of communion; but a banner for truth, a prompter to reformation, and the means of healing breaches: we humbly judge it needful and seasonable in this day of backsliding and division ; hoping it may be useful for maintaining and preserving truth, purity, and godliness in the present age, and for transmitting the same to posterity ; and that it will either be some check to the progress of corruption, or a standing witness against it. Wherefore we join with the said Testimony in witnessing for the truths, and against the evils therein specified ; and in pleading with our Mother to exert herself to stop defection, and essay reformation. And have subscribed these presents,

JOHN WILLISON, M.A., Minister at Dundee.
JOHN GILLIES, M.A., Minister at Carraldstone.

POSTSCRIPT.

THE reason why some late occurrences are not in the Testimony was given before. Wherefore I must now add a word relating to some of them. And, 1st, concerning Mr. Leechman's sermon on prayer, first published last year, which was quarrelled by the presbytery of Glasgow, and brought before the synod, and afterwards to the assembly, this year 1744. Had Mr. Leechman written what he saith in that sermon by way of a letter to a Deist or an enemy to prayer, in order to prove the reasonableness and advantages of prayer, it might have passed without observation : but for a preacher of Christ to deliver such a sermon to a Christian audience, that perhaps never heard him before, and might never hear him again, and to publish it too, in this form, to the whole world, is to me very surprising and offensive. For when he proposes to teach his Christian hearers and readers the nature of prayer, he presents God as the object of it merely as our Creator, without any relation to Jesus Christ the only mediator between God and man. He never speaks of God as upon a throne of grace, nor of the merit, satisfaction, or intercession of Christ, through which prayer can only be offered acceptably to God, more than the old heathens ; nor speaks he of the influence or assistance of the Holy Spirit, by which the duty is to be performed. The disposition of mind which he chiefly recommends to his hearers, for acceptance with God, is an assured trust and confidence in the mercy and goodness of their Creator, without once telling them through all the sermon, which is long, of the channel through which God's mercy and goodness flows to men, that he is a "consuming fire" to sinners out of Christ. Nay, without noticing the scripture account of the conveyance of divine mercy, he asserts that those who pray, trusting in their Creator's mercy, shall be heard and accepted. See Sermon, (2d edit.) p. 7, 8, 10, 42. I know it is said, that the preacher, notwithstanding these defects, is orthodox ; and that he made sound declarations for the truth before the judicatories. But, in my humble opinion, let his after declarations, when in hazard of censure, be never so sound, yet the foresaid omissions in a printed sermon are so very culpable, and such a bad example to students of divinity in one that is their teacher, that the sermon ought to have been disapproved, the preacher admonished, all preachers warned against such a Christless way of preaching, and a warm recommendation given them to observe the 7th act of assembly 1736, concerning evangelical preaching. Nay, the presbytery of Glasgow deserved thanks for the pains they had taken to inquire into that sermon in obedience to the said act of assembly, which enjoins all preachers to have a special regard and eye to Christ in all their sermons, and presbyteries to see that they do it. O how worthless, lifeless, sapless, and fruitless, must all our preachings and prayers be, if precious Christ be left out of them ! Mr. Leechman's sermon is one instance, among many, to show how too well grounded those fears are, which are expressed in the Testimony, that the said act of assembly is but little regarded, and that the numbers are increasing of those who preach moral duties without relation to Christ, through whose strength all our duties are to be performed, and through whose righteousness they must be accepted. And, alas ! it seems to portend little good to this poor church, when men so little versant in the Christian mediatory scheme, or so unaccustomed to evangelical preaching and teaching, are made professors of divinity, and entrusted with the education of young men for the holy ministry. Neither doth it bode well, when men, as soon as they acquire some title to a professor's chair, by the choice of a patron, or of laics of any sort, straightway demit their pastoral charge, and push on their own translation to the chair, without any call or concurrence from the church. As it is well known that was not the practice of former times, so it looks too like the disallowed practice of those prophets who ran before they were sent, Jer. xxiii. 21. A running, alas ! that greatly abounds in this day! May the Lord in mercy put a stop to it!

There is something dropped in the Testimony, in favour of the 7th act of assembly 1722, relating to the Marrow, &c., which act I see is heavily charged by the Associate Presbytery in their act concerning the doctrine of grace, which I had not occasion to read before the Testimony was sent to the press. I have now again read over the assembly's act, and upon second thoughts I shall not say it is so well worded as could be wished, or that the word causality is fit to be used in asserting the necessity of holiness to salvation: but I truly believe the meaning of assembly 1722 was sound, and their intention good, viz., to disapprove every opinion or expression that tended any way to slacken our obligation to the study of holiness; and the brethren have not just ground for their harsh censure of that assembly, because of their saying, in explaining the necessity of holiness for obtaining everlasting happiness, that "it is to be meant only of obtaining the enjoyment and possession of happiness, and not of the right and title to it;" and that "it is dangerous to assert that holy obedience is not a federal or conditional mean, nor has any kind of causality in order to the obtaining of glory, as it seems to exclude all usefulness and influence of holy obedience, in order of means towards the possession of heaven." This last clause of the assembly's words plainly limits the sense in which they disapprove the foresaid assertion, viz., in so far as they seem to exclude the usefulness of holiness in order of means to salvation. Yet the brethren, without noticing that explanatory clause, do in their act concerning the doctrine of grace, published this year, declare that the assembly 1722, by their said 7th act, have opened a wide door to Arminian and Socinian errors to overflow the church and land. It is surprising that this heavy charge against that assembly has lain dormant for twenty-two years, until the most part of that assembly are in their graves; and that they did not openly complain of it at passing the act, but submitted and lived quietly in the communion of the church for many years thereafter. It is uncharitable to charge that assembly with holding opinions contrary to the doctrine of grace, when, in the very act they attack, the assembly professes a close adherence to our standards with respect to the doctrine of grace. And, from their own words, we have all reason to conclude they really did so, and that they held that "Believers have complete salvation and happiness, both as to the title to it and possession of it, only through Christ and his purchase; and that their holiness here, which is a part of their begun salvation, is also a part of Christ's purchase, as well as eternal glory; seeing it is Christ that recovers the lost image of God to us, and restores that which he took not away." And that they held, "that no believer hath any thing in himself, or of his own doing, to rest upon or glory in; but that he owes all to Christ, who has obtained the whole of our salvation, and every part and degree of it, by his blood and merit." That they held all this, is evident from several places of the said act of assembly 1722, wherein they assert, according to our standards, that, "God in the covenant of grace freely offers to a sinner life and salvation by Jesus Christ, and promises and gives his Holy Spirit to all the elect, to make them able and willing to believe and give holy obedience. Also they assert, That God justifies us freely, not for any thing wrought in us or done by us, but for Christ's sake alone: not by imputing faith itself, the act of believing, or any other evangelical obedience, to us as our righteousness: but by imputing the obedience and satisfaction of Christ unto us only. That our repentance doth not make any satisfaction for sin, nor is any cause of the pardon thereof: that our best works cannot any way merit eternal life: that it is a precious gospel truth that believers are free from the law as it is a covenant of works, so as thereby they are neither justified nor condemned," &c.

From these and several other expressions of assembly 1722, we may justly conclude, that their meaning in the expressions quarrelled was sound, and that they intended no hurt to the doctrine of grace: that they did not mean that a believer's holiness hath any causal influence or virtue to purchase heaven; but that it is necessary in order of means, as they speak, towards the possession of it; in regard that God requires holiness in every believer, as the means of preparing and making him meet for possessing heaven. So that the assembly's sense is plainly this, that as Christ's righteousness is necessary in the way of merit, and purchase for obtaining the believer's right and title to heaven, so holiness in a believer, which also Christ hath purchased, is necessary in the way of preparation and meetness for qualifying him for the possession of heaven. Now, we see, it is God himself that makes it so necessary, by fixing an inseparable connection between holiness and happiness, declaring, Heb. xii. 14, that "without holiness no man shall see the Lord." Wherefore, that our brethren after all this should pass such a severe censure against the assembly's doctrine, as opening a wide door for Arminian and Socinian errors, is very unjust, and unbecoming the duty of children to their mother. And it is yet more so, for them to assert (as they do in the same place, p. 41, without any proof for it) that Arminian and Socinian errors have actually overflowed this church like a flood ; whereas they may see a late act of assembly, as well as older acts, condemning all Arminian and Socinian errors, viz. act 7th, assembly 1736. Had they charged some members of the church with such errors, the fault had been less ; but to assert that a flood of Arminian and Socinian errors overflow the church herself, as if all were covered with them, is a charge most terrible and shocking ! I scarce have any words to answer to it, except to regret that any of the reverend and dear brethren, whom I must still regard, should allow themselves to go on in such a latitudinarian way of speaking and calumniating their brethren. Some may think to excuse themselves, that it is from zeal for a good cause, and a design to promote the interest of Christ, that they speak so reproachfully of other ministers : but let such remember what Job said to his three friends when they took the same course, Job xxx. 7, “ Will you speak wickedly for God, and talk deceitfully for him ? ” After all, however ill-grounded this charge be, yet, seeing it comes from a body of men within the land, the church is called to take some course to vindicate herself and her doctrine, though it were no more but to maintain her credit among foreign churches. Surely such a bold charge from our brethren, with other considerations, should at length rouse us, and prevail with the general assembly to fall in with the desire of many ministers and presbyteries, to give a testimony against these errors which abound in the land, to declare their abhorrence of them, and to give warning to all the ministers, preachers, and members of this church, to guard carefully against them, and against every appearance or approach of error.

There is not room here to notice any other thing in the brethren’s act concerning the doctrine of grace, in which though there be many precious truths, yet there are also some assertions too loose, unguarded, and even bordering too near the doctrine called Antinomian ; which should be carefully avoided, as well as that called Neonomian. But, notwithstanding of all these uncharitable sallies, unguarded assertions, and extravagant heights, which our brethren’s desire to support their interest against the established church may drive them to at present ; there is ground to expect, that, after calm and cool thinking, they will not approve themselves in these things, but will come at length to a more charitable temper, and show regard to others whom they see to be sound in the faith, and zealous for the doctrine of grace, as well as themselves. And considering our brethren’s great resolution, and their zeal for the purity of doctrine, I would fain hope God will yet honour them to be useful for maintaining his truths, and make them a witnessing remnant for Calvinist principles, and the doctrine of grace, against all kinds of Pelagian and Arminian errors, which this back-sliding age seems too much inclined to fall in with. Upon which account, I still wish well to them.

There is also joined with the foresaid act, another act for renewing the covenant’s national and solemn league, with a new covenant of the brethren’s framing, in which some things might be noticed : not that I quarrel the duty itself ; No : I approve of covenanting work, whether it be national, presbyterial, or congregational, when rightly managed and gone about ; and I pray earnestly for a covenanting frame and disposition to the whole land. I likewise own, there are several excellent things in the brethren’s covenant, which we are all bound to by the word of God and our national engagements ; and also in their confession of sins, there are many evils enumerated, which all ranks amongst us ought to be deeply humbled for before the Lord : but, alas ! they have marred their Confession, by throwing into it several things which either are doubtful, or else plain mistakes or falsehoods : and yet all these must be confessed and condemned as sins and evils, as if they were the most plain and undoubted facts, and that by a solemn oath : for their confession of sins, which is very long, is adopted and sworn to in their covenant. Yea, the associate brethren have carried this matter to a prodigious height, by making an act, dated at Edinburgh, February 14th, 1744, wherein they agree and determine, that the swearing the foresaid covenant shall be the term of ministerial communion with them, and likewise the term of Christian communion to the people, with respect to their partaking of the seals of God’s covenant. A surprising act indeed ! This new oath and covenant of theirs is called in it, not a term, but the term of Christian communion, as if it were the only qualification for admission required, and as if it answered for the want of others ; and indeed there is not another qualification besides swearing this covenant, mentioned in their act. Now, by this new act, let a man be never so well qualified according to the terms Christ hath determined in his word, yet, if he have not freedom to go in to this term of the brethren’s making, he must be excluded both from ministerial and Christian communion, that is, he must neither be owned as a minister of Christ, nor allowed any of the children’s bread, so far as their authority can go. Wherefore I cannot but testify against this act, as framing new terms and conditions of access to the benefits of Christ’s purchase, for which the framers have no warrant in God’s word ; and therefore it must be a manifest usurpation and encroachment upon the Headship of the King of Zion, and an infringement upon that precious article of our Creed, the communion of saints : which is too much for any judicatory or power on earth to adventure upon. Though the foresaid oath were in things indifferent or lawful, yet it were unwarrantable to impose it as a term of communion, but much more when it is in things sinful, doubtful, or false.

Quest. How do you make it appear that the brethren's new oath and covenant, which they make the term of communion, is in itself sinful ?

Ans. Because by this oath they adopt and approve a confession of sins prefixed to it, and swear by the great name of the Lord our God, with their right hand lifted up to the Lord, that they shall testify against the evils named in that confession, sundry of which are false in fact, calumnious, unjust, and uncharitable ; and yet, by the foresaid solemn oath, the takers own them to be real, just, and true : as for instance, they swear that the general assembly dismissed professor Simson without any censure or express testimony against his errors, p. 104, which is false. Also, they swear that the taking the oath of abjuration is a national sin, p. 103, which they cannot make out. They swear that assembly 1736 adopted professor Campbell's error against self-love, p. 106, which is false. They swear that assembly 1738 condemned the brethren's testimony in bulk, p. 107, which is not fact. They swear that assembly 1739 condemned their Declination, as containing nothing but groundless prejudices, p. 107, which is not fact. They swear that the kind reception of Mr. Whitefield hath increased the sins of the land, and is a denying any particular form of church-government as being of divine institution, p. 109, which is false. They swear that a scheme is now laid for uniting parties of all denominations in church communion, in a way destructive of any testimony for Christ's declarative glory, p. 110, which they can never make appear. They swear that the blessed work in the West of Scotland is a delusion, p. 110, though it had been demonstrated to have the plain scripture tokens of a glorious work of the Spirit of God. They also by their oath condemn all the old persecuted Presbyterian ministers, who accepted of the liberty of preaching the gospel, under king James's toleration, as involving the land in heinous guilt : which is a most rash and uncharitable censure of these worthies, who were honoured to be great sufferers for truth, were men of eminent piety and tenderness of conscience, were signally owned of God in their ministry during that liberty, and never saw cause to repent of their accepting of it to their dying hour. And now, after these glorified saints and sufferers have for many years been triumphing before the throne of the Lamb, a heavy blot and slur must be cast upon their memory by a solemn oath ; and they, who have not freedom to join in that calumnious oath, must be denied Christian communion : this indeed seems to be an act exceeding hard and tyrannical. Alas ! there are thousands who are appointed to swear this oath, and the things above-mentioned, besides many other things in it, who cannot say they know any thing of the truth of them from their own proper knowledge, but only have them by hearsay, or by information from others : and yet they must swear to the truth of them as fully as if they had been eye or ear-witnesses of them, or had read all the histories concerning them. Now, what is this but to make people swear rashly or inconsiderately, or upon implicit faith ? which is contrary to the Bible, that requires us to "swear in truth, judgment, and righteousness," Jer. iv. 2, and also contrary to our Confession of Faith, which declareth, chap. 22, "That whosoever taketh an oath, must avouch nothing therein, but what he is fully persuaded is the truth." O that God in mercy would open the eyes of those who impose this oath, and those who are drawn in or intended to take it, that they may bethink themselves, repent, and proceed no farther ! for "because of swearing the land mourneth" already, and there is no need to add to the grounds of this mourning.

Likewise, in the foresaid oath and covenant, there are some things ambiguous, obscure, and doubtful, which great numbers of the takers know not the meaning of, and so cannot swear them "in judgment and righteousness ;" as, for instance, when they abjure Independency and Latitudinarian Tenets, these are words very general, dark, and dubious, to which the imposers may affix any meaning they think proper. Now, seeing it is commonly granted that the words of an oath ought to be very clear and plain, and these which are dubious may be refused ; what a cruel thing must it be to excommunicate all these sincere Christians and tender consciences who may scruple to swear either to or against what they know not ! I am sure there are many valuable ministers of Jesus Christ, and precious sons of Zion, whom Christ honours and admits to near communion with himself, who will not adventure to swear such an oath ; and will our brethren, notwithstanding, take it on them to reject them as earthen pitchers, and refuse all communion with them ? O, where have they their Master's warrant to act so, or to exclude his redeemed ones from his table, and the food he hath provided for them, for refusing an oath of their framing, containing so many things false, uncharitable, and dark ? when in the mean time these excluded persons appear evidently to be the friends of Christ, whom he himself invites most heartily, saying to them, Cant. v. 1, "Eat, O friends; drink, yea, drink abundantly, O beloved."

I acknowledge that our brethren appear and declare for many things valuable and excellent, for which I wish there were a true universal zeal throughout the land; but, when they mix so many other things choking with these in their testimonies and covenants, how can they expect that people of tender consciences should swallow them? Nay, by this way they give occasion to many to slight and speak evil of the precious things they stand up for. My reverend brethren may believe, if they please, that I write not these things with any ill-will against them, but out of love to them and others, to prevent more sin in the land, and to bring them, if possible, to a more moderate, charitable, and Christ-like temper, that they may be willing to break down these partition walls they are setting up between themselves and others of Christ's ministers and people. O how lamentable a thing is it, that orthodox and zealous preachers of Christ should be carried away to such extravagant heights, by the intemperate zeal and headstrong humours of others who join with them! that they should go about in this manner to divide and distract the flock of Christ, and to rend and tear the members of his body one from another; yea, and to rear up partition walls in the midst of his church so high, that those upon the one side cannot get over them to hold communion with the other! Is this good service to the Lord Jesus Christ? Is this the way to promote his cause and interest in the world? Is this the way to heal breaches and promote union among the true friends and lovers of Christ, which he makes the duty of all faithful gospel ministers? Is not our glorious Master "the Prince of peace?" Hath he not said, "Blessed are the peace-makers?" Was it not he that prayed for the union and peace of his church? Was it not he that recommended peace to us, and enjoined us to "pray for the peace of Jerusalem?" Let none mistake me, as if I were for peace on any terms; for they may see by the foregoing Testimony I am for truth as well as peace, and desire through grace to be zealous for both.

Some, who have seen this Testimony, object, That it is not impartial with respect to Mr. Whitefield's success while he was in Scotland. The plain truth is, several things were said relative to it, where he is mentioned, which were dropped to gratify some of the subscribers, who were not then satisfied as to the facts narrated. But, since that time, I am well informed of the lasting good effects of his ministry upon not a few in and about Edinburgh and elsewhere, who once were careless and profane, but now are wonderfully changed and reformed, and still living as becometh Christians, persevering in the ways of the Lord; though at the same time I know no reason to make him the instrument of that extraordinary work at Cambuslang, Kilsyth, and other places, but to ascribe it, under God, to the ministry of their worthy pastors, whom God made instrumental both to begin and carry on that work a good time before Mr. Whitefield came to preach at any of these places. But seeing God honoured Mr. Whitefield's ministry in other nations and countries, though ordained a minister of the church of England, and also had opened his eyes so far, as to become Calvinist and sound in the doctrine of grace, and to witness against several corruptions of the English church, for which he was persecuted and under process; and seeing he had conformed to us in doctrine and worship, professed to lie open to instruction as to our constitution and government, and was come at length to assert openly "Christ to be the King and Head of his church, and that the church of Scotland was the best constituted national church in the world;" and also had wrote and said some other things that gave ground to hope that his eyes might be opened to see the evil of Prelacy; and in the mean time he was most indefatigable in preaching Christ to sinners, and remarkably owned of God in his ministry: to have refused a kind reception to a stranger and persecuted man, in such circumstances, when he came among us, had neither been charitable nor generous. Now, for the brethren to make this reception such a sin, that none can be admitted to baptism or the Lord's supper without condemning it by a solemn oath, is most surprising; especially considering they were the first themselves who recommended him to the people of Scotland, and that in very strong terms! Surely it becomes us to be silent, and adore the sovereignty of the great God, in employing whom he will to promote his interest and kingdom in the world. If God think fit to make use of Mr. Whitefield, or other Methodists, to turn sinners from their evil ways, to seek after a Saviour, and God through him, we should not oppose it, but let them alone, lest haply we be found fighting against God.

I doubt not but some may quarrel me and this Testimony, for making too free with the Associate Brethren: but they may see I have been as plain and free with others, and even with the established church, relating to things I judge wrong; and this seemed to be necessary to render the Testimony the more impartial. But, after all, when I look inward, and view the sins of my own heart, and the sad corruption of my nature, besides outward defects, I have reason to blush and be ashamed to take notice of the sins and failings of others; and even to lie in the dust, and cry, "Unclean, unclean;" and with much self-abhorrence to look towards the blood of Jesus, that cleanseth us from all sin. May the Holy Spirit apply it to me and the whole land!

I shall now conclude with my earnest wishes and prayers, that the Lord may excite a praying remnant, to wrestle and be importunate with him for sparing mercy to these guilty nations; and that he would revive a covenanted work of reformation through Britain and Ireland, and the dominions thereto belonging, from which these lands have wofully departed; and uphold and encourage all who breathe after reformation, and the coming of Christ's kingdom in the world; and even countenance more and more these instruments who, according to the light given them, labour with earnestness to awaken perishing sinners from their lost and natural estate, to flee to a crucified Jesus for safety from sin and wrath; and, wherein any of them remain unenlightened, that the Lord would send out his light and truth to lead them, and graciously deliver them from all mistakes, errors, and corruptions whatsoever: that, what they see not, the Father of lights may teach them, that so they may be honoured more and more to bring multitudes from following sinful courses to the ways of true religion and gospel-holiness; and from resting on their own righteousness, or a form of godliness, to come and embrace him who is the "Lord our righteousness, and follow him whithersoever he goeth."

And particularly, "that the Lord would come and revive his work in Scotland, that once was famous through all the churches, and esteemed one of the most bright and shining candlesticks of Christ in the world, but now under a lamentable decay of zeal for pure religion and reformation; and that he would cause us remember with godly sorrow from whence we have fallen, repent, and do our first works. That he would pity these who, Gallio-like, are indifferent and unconcerned about our defections and the grounds of the Lord's controversy which he is pleading with the land, and awaken those who 'are at ease in Zion,' in such a time, and would fain sit down, Issachar-like, 'and couch under the burden.' That he would come suddenly to his temple, even in a national way, and sit as a refiner and purifier of silver, and purify the sons of Levi, and cast out buyers and sellers out of his house. That he would in mercy shut that door whereby a corrupt ministry enters into the church, and raise up a faithful, zealous, and reforming ministry through the land, and make all ranks among us concerned to attain to the reforming spirits and dispositions of our fathers. O! when shall we come their length in reformation?

"That the Lord would help us to bless him for his astonishing kindness to this land, in such a backsliding, withering, and decaying time, in vouchsafing to water several spots of his vineyard here and there with the refreshing rain of his Spirit: and that he would continue, increase, and spread the shower, until the whole garden be watered; that so our dry ground may become a green pasture, and our wilderness blossom as the rose. That in his free mercy he would forgive our great ingratitude for former kindness, preserve us from the errors, power, and cruelty of Papists, and avert these black clouds of wrath which now threaten us; and that, instead of pouring out the vials of indignation on us which we deserve, he would pour out a spirit of repentance and reformation upon all degrees of men, from the highest to the lowest. That amidst the reelings, shakings, backslidings, and divisions of these times, he would preserve pure religion, and support all those who desire to cleave to the Lord Jesus, love him in sincerity, and witness for his truths and ways. That he would encourage them under all their discouragements, and keep them from being carried down the stream of defection with others. That he would unite the hearts and minds of all that desire honestly to witness against the evils of the day, and help them to temper their zeal with knowledge, wisdom and meekness; and graciously to forgive all those who fail in this respect, rectifying their mistakes, and honour them to be instruments of his glory in the land." This is and shall be the earnest prayer of

JOHN WILLISON.

THE IMPERIAL ATLAS OF MODERN GEOGRAPHY;

A Series of One Hundred carefully coloured Maps, embracing the most recent Discoveries, and the latest Political Divisions of Territory in all parts of the World. Compiled from the most authentic sources, under the supervision of W. G. BLACKIE, Ph.D., F.R.G.S. With an INDEX, containing References to nearly 120,000 Places.

In fulness and accuracy of information, largeness of scale, and clearness of engraving, this Atlas will compare favourably with the most costly works of the kind extant. It is portable, and can be consulted with ease, being an imperial 4to, measuring when closed 15 inches by 11 inches. The Maps are printed on paper measuring 22 inches by 15, and carefully coloured. The Series extends to Seventy-eight such Sheets, comprising above One Hundred different Maps.

"After a careful perusal of the whole work, we can safely say that we know of no Atlas, published at the same low price, which is so copious and accurate in detail, so clearly printed, and so well engraved; that no maps have been hitherto constructed on scales so carefully adapted to the relative importance of countries, as viewed from the stand-point of English merchants and general readers."—London Review.

In 30 Parts, imperial 8vo, 2s. 6d. each.

THE IMPERIAL GAZETTEER: A GENERAL DICTIONARY OF GEOGRAPHY,

PHYSICAL, POLITICAL, STATISTICAL, and DESCRIPTIVE; including comprehensive Accounts of the Countries, Cities, Principal Towns, Villages, Seas, Lakes, Rivers, Islands, Mountains, Valleys, &c., in the World. Two large Volumes, 2670 pages, imperial 8vo, cloth, £4, 6s.

"This excellent book of reference. . . . All the articles we have examined, whether long or short, exhibit a greater degree of correctness in minute detail than we should have thought practicable in so comprehensive a work."—Athenæum.

"By far the best Gazetteer in our language."—Critic.

In 30 Parts, imperial 8vo, 2s. 6d. each.

THE IMPERIAL DICTIONARY, ENGLISH, TECHNOLOGICAL, AND SCIENTIFIC;

On the Basis of Webster's English Dictionary, with the addition of many Thousand Words and Phrases, including the most generally used Technical and Scientific Terms, together with their Etymology and their Pronunciation. Also a SUPPLEMENT, containing an extensive collection of Words, Terms, and Phrases, not included in previous English Dictionaries. By J. OGILVIE, LL.D. Illustrated by above 2500 Engravings on Wood.

"Dr. Ogilvie has not only produced the best English Dictionary that exists, but, so far as the actual state of knowledge permitted, has made some approach towards perfection."—British Quarterly Review.

"The most comprehensive work of the kind we possess. We have examined attentively, and can report most favourably of its execution."—Atlas.

In 38 Parts, imperial 4to, 2s. 6d. each.

THE IMPERIAL FAMILY BIBLE,

Containing the OLD and NEW TESTAMENTS, according to the most Correct Copies of the Authorized Version. With many Thousand Critical, Explanatory, and Practical Notes; also, References, Readings, Chronological Tables, and Indexes. Illustrated by a Superb Series of Engravings.

The Engraved Illustrations, 74 in number, consist of a Series of Historical Subjects, selected with much care and research from the Works of the Old Masters, and from those of the existing Schools of Painting on the Continent and in Britain, and a Series of Views of important Bible Localities, from authentic drawings; the whole engraved in the most finished manner.

Complete in 36 Parts, 2s. each, forming 4 handsome Volumes, super-royal 8vo.

THE COMPREHENSIVE HISTORY OF ENGLAND,

CIVIL and MILITARY, RELIGIOUS, INTELLECTUAL, and SOCIAL: from the Earliest Period to the Suppression of the Sepoy Revolt. By CHARLES MACFARLANE and the Rev. THOMAS THOMSON. Illustrated by above Eleven Hundred Engravings on Wood and Steel—Views, Costumes, Portraits, Maps, Plans, &c., &c.

"We regard this publication as by far the most beautiful, cheap, and really 'comprehensive' history of the nation which has ever yet appeared."—John Bull.

"An admirable record, not only of military and political events, but of moral and intellectual progress, thus comprising, in fact, a real History of England."—Civil Service Gazette.

"This ought emphatically to be entitled the Family History of England."—Morning Herald.

Publishing in Parts, super-royal 8vo, 2s. each.

A COMPREHENSIVE HISTORY OF INDIA,

CIVIL, MILITARY, and SOCIAL, from the first landing of the English, to the suppression of the Sepoy Revolt, including an Outline of the Early History of Hindoostan. By HENRY BEVERIDGE, Esq., Advocate. Illustrated by above Five Hundred Engravings on Wood and Steel. It will extend to 25 Parts.

"This elaborate and able work is indeed more comprehensive than its title would imply, for it gives us with philosophical discrimination the ancient, mediæval, and modern history of a most singular people, who were well fed and well clad, who had a written language, and composed metaphysical treatises, when the forefathers of the race that now bears sway over two hundred millions of them were still wandering in the woods of Britain and Germany, all of them savages, and some perhaps cannibals.

The numerous engravings on wood and steel, remarkable for their beauty and fidelity, contribute greatly to the interest and even to the instructive power of the work."—Examiner.

New and revised edition, in Parts, 2s., and Divisions, 10s. each.

THE POPULAR ENCYCLOPEDIA;

OR, CONVERSATIONS LEXICON.

Being a General Dictionary of Arts, Sciences, Literature, Biography, History, and Politics; with Preliminary Dissertations by distinguished Writers.

The POPULAR ENCYCLOPEDIA has been before the public for many years past, and has met with a large measure of acceptance. The alterations and corrections made for the present edition render the Work a satisfactory exponent of the state of knowledge in the present day. The articles on Botany, Chemistry, and Geology have been wholly re-written, and the scientific articles generally have been carefully revised; and those on Geography, Topography, History, Theology, and Biography have been subjected to a rigid examination.

An entirely new SUPPLEMENT has been written, containing additional biographies, notices of localities newly discovered, or that have risen recently into importance—of substances and processes new in science and the arts—of the great events of the world during the last twenty years—and other subjects of general interest.

The Illustrations of the POPULAR ENCYCLOPEDIA have been augmented fully a half, and extend to One Hundred and Fifty-four Pages of Steel Engravings, and Fourteen Coloured Maps, besides many Engravings on Wood. The whole Work, including Supplement, will be completed in 63 Parts, price 2s. each; or in 14 Divisions, 10s. each.
